PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 25, 1919.

(Legislative day of Saturday, August 23, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I present resolutions adopted at a mass meeting held in Denver, August 13, under the auspices of the Friends of Irish Freedom, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted at the mass meeting held in Denver August 13, 1919, under the auspices of the Friends of Irish Freedom.

1. Resolved, That we, American citizens, in mass meeting in Denver August 13, 1919, believing in human liberty and the principle of self-determination, call upon the Congress of the United States to stand true in this hour of the world's crisis to all our American principles, which are those and only those of justice and humanity, and which we ever as valiantly uphold for the weak and downtrodden among the nations as for the mighty and powerful.

2. Resolved, That we call upon Congress to refuse to sanction in the peace treaty itself whatever is unjust and outrageous.

3. Resolved, That we are unalterably opposed to the present covenant of the league of nations because it impairs American sovereignty, nullifies the Constitution of the United States, destroys the Monroe doctrine, and guarantees the world supremacy of the two remaining despotic Empires of the world—Great Britain and Japan.

4. Resolved, That we condemn with the indignation of outraged Americans articles 10 and 11 of said league of nations as a direct violation of the principles of self-determination, and as a base attempt to prevent for all time the people of Ireland and many other nations from ever enjoying the blessings conferred upon us by our own Declaration of Independence.

5. Resolved, That we, as is our right, demand that Congress prove its unqualified adherence to the principles of self-determination and the rights of small nations by officially recognizing the de facto Republic of Ireland, a Republic established by the vote of an overwhelming majority of the Irish people; and, finally, be it

6. Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted to the President and Congress of the United States.

M. J. CRATTY, President.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, now that the treaty of peace with Germany, including, as it does, the covenant of the league of nations, has been officially laid before the Senate and we are certain as to its terms, and as I am now and for months past have been an enthusiastic advocate of such league, I desire to trespass upon the patience of Senators for a brief period in order to discuss certain questions involved in it.

The league of nations is a matter in which the people, not only of the United States but of the entire world, are intensely interested, as the primary object sought to be attained through it is "international peace and security."

The question whether or not we should become a member of the league is not a partisan political question. It is an American question and concerns us as a people and not as members of any political organization, hence we should consider it with minds entirely free from partisan prejudice or bias, and actuated by the desire to relieve the world of the red scourge of war, if we can do so without surrendering our material rights as a free and independent Nation.

Many distinguished Republicans are supporting the league, while, on the other hand, prominent Democrats are opposing it.

The late Col. Roosevelt advocated the organization of a league of nations to prevent war, in a speech delivered at Christiania, Norway, in 1910, when he said:

> Each nation must keep well prepared to defend itself until the establishment of some form of international police power competent and willing to prevent violence as between nations. As things are now, such power to command peace throughout the world could best be assured by some combination between those great nations which sincerely desire peace and have no thought themselves of committing aggressions. The combination might at first be only to secure peace within certain definite limits and certain definite conditions; but the ruler or statesman who should bring about such a combination would have earned his place in history for all time and his title to the gratitude of all mankind.

The League to Enforce Peace was organized in the fall of 1914, and included in its membership are Democrats and Republicans who are well known throughout the country.

I repeat that the league question is not one of partisan politics, and it should not be considered or debated as such.

I am ready and willing to do all that lies in my power to bring about the establishment of the league in the belief that it will make impossible another such calamity as overtook the world in August, 1914, and engulfed it in a sea of blood and suffering for more than four long years.

No friend of the league contends that the covenant is a perfect document or that all of its provisions meet with his unqualified approval. There were no precedents to guide its framers, as, so far as my knowledge extends, this is the first time that an earnest effort to prevent war throughout the world has been made by the leading nations of the earth, acting in absolute good faith. When we take into consideration the fact that the representatives of the nations participating in the peace conference who, by unanimous vote, agreed upon the covenant represented different races, widely different religious beliefs, and many conflicting interests, the wonder grows that it was possible to enter into an agreement that is so nearly perfect as it is.

The covenant can be amended, and I do not doubt that as time and experience demonstrate the necessity for amendment such amendments will be adopted as will tend to more completely carry out its purposes, and we should bear in mind that our Constitution has been amended eighteen times since it was ordained. I am convinced that the league, operating under the terms of the covenant as it is written, will be in a position to prevent war entirely or to make it all but impossible, and that is a condition devoutly to be hoped for. Granting, for the sake of argument only, that we shall be disappointed and that the league can not accomplish the results we so much desire, the world will be no worse off than before the war, when practically every nation on the Continent of Europe was an armed camp and a spark was all that was necessary to set the world ablaze.

Nothing can be worse than the conditions that prevailed for forty-odd years prior to 1914, and I am willing to at least endeavor to bring about a new order through the medium of the league of nations, particularly in view of the fact that we jeopardize none of our vital sovereign rights in becoming one of its members.

President Wilson announced his adherence to the idea of a league of nations in his message to the Congress on April 2, 1917, when he said:

> A steadfast concert for peace can never be maintained except by a partnership of democratic nations. * * * It must be a league of honor, a partnership of opinion.

When he went to Europe last winter he made a number of addresses on the subject of the league in England, France, and Italy, and the common people of those countries, appalled by the tremendous losses they had sustained and the indescribable sufferings and privations they had endured, adopted the President's views with unbounded enthusiasm. Public opinion was reflected in the deliberations of the statesmen of the allied countries and in the adoption of the covenant. It carries within itself the hope of humanity throughout the world, and it should not be disregarded and cast aside until a better plan to preserve peace is presented.

The President has been viciously assailed and subjected to unfair and unjust criticism because of his attitude toward the league and the efforts put forth by him to make it a reality. It is my calm and deliberate judgment that the league will be brought into being, that it will bring peace on earth for many years to come—and permanently, I trust—and that, when the history of our day is written, President Wilson will be universally recognized as one of the greatest of the benefactors of mankind and will stand on the same plane in the esteem of the American people as that now occupied by Washington and Lincoln.

Mr. President, I appreciate the great responsibility that rests upon the members of this body and I desire to call the attention of Senators to the fact that, should we fail to ratify the peace treaty and because of such failure the league dies aborning, upon us and upon us alone will rest the blame for the next great war which will rock the earth to its very foundations.

In my opinion, the next world conflict will be one of almost total annihilation of armies and extermination of peoples because of the advances made by scientific men in the art—if you will permit the word—of the destruction of men and property. It will be a veritable slaughter, and I deem it my bounden duty to avert it if it can be done with honor, and I believe it can be through the medium of the league. There is but one alternative to the league of nations, and that is preparation for war, which always means war eventually. Without the league it will become necessary for us, and for every other nation, to proceed to arm to the teeth. We shall be obliged to expend billions of dollars for coast-defense purposes; in increasing the size of our Navy until it will be equal to, or superior to, the navies of any two or three nations that might possibly combine against us; in the manufacture of cannon, machine guns, small arms, airplanes, and the thousand and one other things that will be vitally necessary to our defense. We shall have imposed upon us a system of compulsory military service. Our country will become a military camp. There will be a soldier or a sailor on the back of every taxpayer in the Nation, and in the end there will be another deluge of blood and grief and sorrow and suffering in every village and hamlet throughout the land.

I call attention to the fact that the principle of the league of nations is not new to us. It has been said that the United States is such a league and it has been pointed out that, while the thirteen original Colonies were English and peopled very largely by men and women of that nationality, they were independent of each other in large measure. When it was sought to bring those Colonies together under a Federal government, many Americans of prominence predicted dire results to the people generally and to the several States under such government, and it was 13 years after the Declaration of Independence before our present Constitution was established.

When the proposed Federal Constitution was being considered by the people of the several Colonies, many eminent Americans opposed it, and certain of the arguments advanced against its adoption were very similar to those made against the league of nations.

Patrick Henry, orator, statesman, and ardent patriot, in speaking of the Constitution, said:

> Is this tame relinquishment of rights worthy of freemen? Is it worthy of the manly fortitude that ought to characterize republicans? It is said that eight States have accepted the plan. I declare that if twelve and a half had adopted it, I would with manly fortitude and in spite of an erring world, reject it.

In a speech delivered in the New York Convention, Delegate Smith, in referring to the provision providing for the creation of the Senate, said:

> Can the liberties of 3,000,000 people be securely trusted in the hands of 24 men? Is it prudent to commit to so small a number the decision of the great questions that shall come before them? Reason revolts at the idea.

In the Massachusetts Convention Delegate Nason said:

> We have sworn that Massachusetts is a sovereign and an independent State. How, then, can we vote for this Constitution that destroys that sovereignty?

And Gov. Thompson, of Massachusetts, paid his respects to the Constitutional Convention in the following language:

> The convention was sent on to Philadelphia to amend this confederation, but they have made a new creature, and the very setting out of it is unconstitutional.

I could quote similar reasons given by other prominent men for their opposition to the adoption of the Constitution, but I have proceeded far enough to serve my purpose, which is to point out that it was contended by them, as it is now contended by the opponents of the league, that the Constitution deprived the people of their "rights," destroyed the "sovereignty" of the States, was "unconstitutional," and placed the "liberties" of the people in the hands of a small number of men.

The disastrous results that, in the opinion of certain of our illustrious forefathers, would follow the adoption of the Constitution have not materialized, and I venture to assert that, should the league become an accomplished fact, the fears of the distinguished gentlemen who are its opponents will not become realities.

We became a member of a league of nations for the purpose of making war on Germany, and I earnestly contend that there is no sufficient reason why we should not join such league for the more humane and laudable purpose of preserving the blessings of peace to the world.

The opponents of the league assert that the covenant as it is written is in contravention of our Constitution in that it takes from the Congress the right to declare war and to determine questions relating to our armament and vests that authority in the league council. As I view it, there is nothing in the covenant upon which those contentions can fairly be based. The council is, in large measure, an advisory body, and its decisions are recommendatory only.

Under our Constitution the Congress alone has the power "to declare war" and "to raise and support armies" (Art I, sec. 8). Article VI reads as follows:

> The Constitution and laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

The Supreme Court has decided that the treaty power "is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument" (the Constitution), and that "it would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids." (Geofry v. Riggs, 133 U. S., p. 267.)

The parties to a treaty are obliged to take cognizance of the "supreme law of the land" relating to the treaty-making powers of the negotiators and we must presume that the parties to the treaty with Germany took cognizance of the limitations prescribed by the Constitution on the power of the American peace commissioners.

Article 10 of the covenant is in the following language:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

It will be observed that said article grants no authority to the council to do anything more than to advise the league members with respect to the means that should be adopted to resist such aggression or threatened aggression, and should it advise that war be entered upon, such advice must be accepted by us before it can be followed, and the only branch of our Government that can accept it and take the steps necessary to carry it into effect is the Congress.

For the foregoing reasons I deny that the power to declare war is taken from the Congress and lodged in the council.

Article 13 of the covenant deals with the question of disarmament and reads, in part, as follows:

> The council, taking account of the geographical situation and circumstances of each State, shall formulate plans for such reduction (referring to armament) for the consideration and action of the several Governments. * * * After these plans shall have been adopted by the several Governments, the limits of armament therein fixed shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the council.

It is apparent from the language used that the council merely recommends what the armament of each nation shall be, and that the recommendation must be adopted by the several Governments before it becomes effective. The Congress alone can adopt the recommendations of the council and enact laws in conformity therewith, and it is not required to do so if it is of opinion said recommendations should be rejected. The council is without authority, either express or implied, to enforce its recommendation.

The United States will at all times have one member of the council and, as its decisions in respect of the matter of armaments must be by unanimous vote, it is reasonable to assume that we shall be fairly dealt with, and that the council will recommend the reduction of the armament of other nations in the same proportion as ours.

The Senate has the constitutional power to ratify the pending treaty, which is nothing more than a contract; and, should it do so, we shall of course be bound by its terms and conditions. Should the Congress adopt the recommendation of the council as to armament, it will proceed to enact an Army bill and a Navy bill for the purpose of providing for our military needs. In other words, the Congress will exercise its constitutional power to "raise and support armies," even though the size of the Army has been fixed by the council of the league. That procedure is the same in principle as the entry of a judgment by a court in accordance with an agreement in the form of a stipulation entered into between the parties to the action.

Many of the critics of the league contend that should we become a member of it we shall surrender our sovereignty as a nation. I am well aware of the fact that in international law a somewhat different meaning is given the word "sovereign," when applied to a State, than the generally accepted meaning of the word; but I believe that since absolute monarchies, autocracies, no longer exist there is no nation that is, as a matter of fact, sovereign, as the word is generally understood, for the reason they are bound by the provisions of treaties and by international law, both of which all honorable nations respect, to so regulate their affairs as to observe certain of the rights of other nations.

American citizens are frequently referred to as "sovereign citizens," but they are required by law to so conduct themselves and to so use their property as not to interfere with the legal rights of others.

Nations have rights as well as individuals, and I know of no valid reason why there should be a distinction drawn between the so-called "sovereign right" of a nation to fight and plunder its weaker neighbor and the "right" of an individual to do those things.

I admit that should we join the league we will lose certain of our rights that are referred to as sovereign, but the fact is that all other league members will lose identical rights, and that we shall all be placed in the same position with respect to each other that we now occupy as sovereign States.

Instead of declaring war when it suits our purpose, we shall be obliged to submit our disputes with other members to arbitration or to inquiry by the council and not make war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report of the council, and not then against a member complying with the award. It is provided by article 12 of the covenant that "the award of the arbitrators shall be made within a reasonable time, and the report of the council shall be made within six months after the submission of the dispute."

To those who believe that we should not join the league for the reason we shall relinquish our "sovereign right" to declare war when it pleases us so to do, I say that we are now deprived of that "right," and that such deprivation was brought about with our consent and at our solicitation.

What are commonly known as the Bryan peace treaties are now in effect with 20 nations, including practically all of the great powers except Germany and Japan, and have been negotiated with 10 other nations. The Senate has ratified 28 of said treaties, but ratifications have been exchanged with but 20 nations. They provide, in substance, that we shall submit any and all disputes that may arise between ourselves and the other nation that is a party to the treaty to an international commission for investigation and report; that we shall not go to war until such time as the report of the commission has been made, and that need not be until the expiration of a year from the time the investigation is begun, and in certain of them we agree that until the rendition of the report we will not increase our military forces except in the event we are menaced by a third power.

We know from experience that when men who are ablaze with anger and are ready and willing to fight to the death are prevented from so doing they will arrive at a peaceable adjustment of their differences after "cooling time" has intervened and their mutual friends have had an opportunity to point out to them the folly of a personal encounter over a matter that can be arranged by mutual concessions, by apologies, or by the clearing away of misunderstandings.

The same policy can be successfully pursued in quarrels between nations, and it is in that belief, in my judgment, that the Bryan treaties were negotiated and ratified and the framers of the league covenant incorporated in it article 12.

Even in the affairs of nations much can be accomplished in six months or nine months. Other nations can tender their good offices in effecting an amicable settlement of disputes and an investigation on the part of the arbitrators or the council must be beneficial in its results, and I am convinced that, under the provisions of the covenant, world wars can and will be averted.

In the event we join the league, we shall lose our "sovereign right" to arm ourselves to the teeth, as we shall have agreed in good faith to "the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations," as provided in article 8. All other members of the league will also lose that right and I shall consider it a blessing to humanity. Germany was an arsenal for more than 40 years, and largely because of that fact she plagued the world with more ills than escaped from Pandora's box, and I earnestly hope that no nation will ever again be permitted to do likewise.

Speaking generally, I submit that whenever we enter into a treaty we place a limitation upon our sovereignty with respect to the subject matter of the treaty.

I shall not weary the Senate by calling attention to the various treaties in which we have limited our sovereignty, which include our agreement with respect to warships on the Great Lakes and our agreement not to discriminate in favor of American shipping in the use of the Panama Canal, and will content myself by repeating that whatever loss of sovereignty we may sustain by joining the league, all other member nations will suffer the same loss, hence we need not be at all apprehensive of danger because of such loss on our part.

Mr. President, it has been eloquently and strongly asserted in this Chamber, on numerous occasions, that if we enter into the league of nations we shall become embroiled in all the quarrels of Europe, and, in effect, that we should hold ourselves aloof from the affairs of the world and endeavor to maintain our once-boasted position of "splendid isolation."

To support those assertions, the shade of Washington has been invoked and his Farewell Address has frequently been referred to.

That address was published in 1796, at which time we were in our infancy as a Nation, having a population of about 3,000,000. It was, of course, prepared in the light of world conditions as they then existed. We are now confronted by an entirely different situation than then obtained, and are obliged to deal with it as it is. Then it required months to communicate with Europe; now communication can be had in a few minutes by electric cable or by wireless telegraphy. Then a voyage to England or France was a matter of months, by sailing ships; now it can be made in a week or less. In that day airplanes were unknown; now planes carrying both freight and passengers and flying at the rate of 75 miles or more per hour are coming into common use. A short time since, two aviators flew across the Atlantic in a plane in 16 hours, and within the past 60 days a great dirigible balloon, capable of lifting 50 tons, sailed from Scotland to America, a distance of more than 3,200 miles, in 108 hours, notwithstanding unfavorable weather conditions, and on the return trip sailed from Long Island to Ireland in about 70 hours. Recent news dispatches have informed us that England is now constructing a dirigible more than 1,100 feet in length and with a lifting capacity of 100 tons.

In view of those well-recognized facts, I insist that our isolation is a thing of the past and that, whether we will it or not, we must take our proper place in the world of to-day, as we are vitally interested in what transpires therein.

Nations, like individuals, can not stand still. They must move either forward or backward. This, above all other ages, is one of progress and development, and as conditions change, and they are changing rapidly, policies must be changed so as to conform to them.

In 1796 practically every nation in Europe was an empire or a monarchy, most of them absolute monarchies. Their system of government differed radically from ours, and as we had but little in common with them it was to our distinct advantage to remain separate and apart from them, "their turmoil, and their strife." Now, however, the nations of Europe, particularly those that are our friends, are republics or constitutional monarchies, and we should join hands with them in the league of nations for our own protection, if for no other reason.

Washington stated a fact when he said, in 1796, that we then were but remotely interested in the affairs of Europe and for that reason we should not "implicate ourselves by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities."

How different is the situation now! The war demonstrated that we are not remotely, but immediately and vitally, concerned in the affairs of Europe, particularly in the quarrels that may result in war, and that it is a matter of supreme importance to us to bring about such a combination of nations as will make another world conflagration impossible.

Washington said that "our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course," that is, a different course than to involve ourselves in the politics of Europe, but it is apparent to all men that "our detached and distant situation" no longer exists owing to the speedy means of communication and that, from the world viewpoint, Europe is as close to us as is Chicago to New York.

Washington, in his address, also said that the "period is not far off * * * when we may take such attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected." At the outbreak of the late war our country was, without doubt, in point of population, wealth, and resources, far beyond what Washington had ever hoped it would be. Shortly after war began in Europe, President Wilson proclaimed our neutrality as between the belligerents and did all that an honest, self-respecting, patriotic American could do to keep us out of the war, but, notwithstanding our greatness and our strength, our neutrality was not respected, "scrupulously" or otherwise. On the contrary, it was disregarded and our ships were sunk, our property destroyed, our flag fired upon, and our men, women, and children sent to watery graves by German submarines. And, in my opinion, those happenings will again occur in the event of a world conflict.

Washington advised us "to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world." He did not object to temporary alliances, certain of which he himself had been instrumental in forming, but he did not want us to ally ourselves permanently with any foreign nation.

The alliances that he had in mind were those of his day, the alliances of which he had knowledge. What were they? They were alliances entered into between kings and emperors, and they were born of a desire for power and conquest. They were the alliances of despots and had for their objects, among other things, the stifling of the cry for liberty that was on the lips, and the crushing of the hope for a republican form of government that was in the hearts, of a multitude of God's creatures. They were alliances against the right of men everywhere to enjoy freedom and happiness under a government in which they would have a voice.

It is not surprising that Washington was opposed to such compacts, as he was a lover of peace and justice. When he prepared his address he did not dream that the time would come when the civilized nations of the earth would enter into an alliance for the purpose of preserving the peace of the world, and I do not doubt that were he here to-day he would be a strong, an earnest, and an eloquent supporter of the league of nations.

Mr. President, many years ago we became a world power and left behind us the doctrine of noninterference in foreign affairs.

We entered upon a colonial policy through the acquisition of the Philippine Islands. I was opposed to the taking over of those islands at the time, and I have not since changed my views with respect to them. I am looking forward to the day when we shall be well rid of them, and I shall vote to give independence to their inhabitants whenever I have an opportunity to do so. They are a source of weakness as well as danger to us, as they are 7,000 miles from our shores. They are unable to defend themselves, and we can not give them adequate protection.

We initiated the "open door" policy in China and intervened there, in conjunction with other great powers, at the time of the Boxer rebellion.

At the request of the Kaiser, our Government, in 1906, sent a representative to the Algeciras conference, held for the purpose of determining whether or not Germany should obtain a foothold in Morocco.

We have taken over five or six islands in the Samoan group.

We have guaranteed the independence of Panama, and are exercising a protectorate over Cuba, and what is virtually a protectorate over Haiti, Santo Domingo, and Nicaragua.

Mr. President, we have not a sufficient army to adequately guard even 200 miles of our coast line against any power or combination of powers that might defeat our Navy.

At the outbreak of the late war neither England nor Russia were prepared, nor were we when we entered it, and we know of the great losses sustained, both in men and money, because of those facts.

We are in such position that we are obliged to join the league and thereby prevent future world wars, or abandon our colonies and bankrupt ourselves in preparing for the next war that is certain to come.

Mr. President, the Monroe doctrine has been the subject matter of much discussion not only in this Chamber but throughout the country, and the fear has been expressed by distinguished men that the league covenant does not sufficiently safeguard it.

It is well known that the doctrine was announced by President Monroe in a message to the Congress in December, 1823, and was our answer to the threat of the Holy Alliance to assist Spain in again bringing under her dominion her former colonies on this continent which had successfully revolted and set up independent governments, and it was and is intended, primarily, for our own protection. It is a fixed, settled policy of the United States, and all the world knows that we shall insist upon its strict observance and shall defend it to the uttermost limit of our power.

It has been affirmed and reaffirmed by about 10 of our Presidents and about 20 of our Secretaries of State, certain of whom gave it slightly different shadings in order to meet then existing conditions.

It has not been officially recognized by any European or Asiatic Government, so far as my knowledge goes, through the medium of a treaty or otherwise.

There is not now and there has never been anything behind the doctrine save and except the man power, the wealth, and other resources of the United States, and the determination on the part of our people to maintain it at all hazards, and all nations appreciate those facts.

I am as much interested in the preservation of the doctrine as any American can be, and am glad that it will be recognized by the members of the league.

I submit that it is amply safeguarded in the covenant, article 21 of which is as follows:

> Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings, like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.

It appears to me from that language that the exclusion of the doctrine from the jurisdiction of the league is not open to question. If the article quoted referred to "regional understandings" only, there might be room for doubt, but it specifically includes the doctrine; therefore the argument that it is not safeguarded because it is not a "regional understanding" is the very refinement of technicality, to say nothing of sophistry.

Why any fair-minded man should contend for a moment that the Monroe doctrine is not a "regional understanding" is beyond my comprehension. The world has had the "understanding" for nearly a century that it is effective in the Western Hemisphere, that that is the "region" into which no nation will be permitted by us to penetrate with the purpose of extending its system of government, or to overthrow an independent government and substitute in its stead another form, or to enter upon a colonial policy. That "understanding" has been so complete that no European nation, aside from France, has sought to override the doctrine, and the Emperor Napoleon withdrew his forces from Mexico when, after the Civil War, Gen. Sheridan and an army were sent to the Mexican border.

Mr. President, article 10, which I have heretofore quoted in part, is probably the most bitterly criticized of all the articles of the covenant, because of the fact it guarantees "as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league."

It must at all times be borne in mind that the principal reason for the organization of the league is to prevent war, and there certainly can be no more effective way to do that than to let it be universally known that the nation that declines to arbitrate its differences with another nation or to submit such differences to inquiry by the league council, and insists upon waging war, will find opposing her the combined forces of the league, if necessary. No nation on earth will resort to war with that certainty confronting it.

It was vitally necessary, in my judgment, to extend the guaranty in article 10 to the Republics that have been formed very largely out of the territory of the Central Powers. Poland, Czechoslovakia, Armenia, and other new States are not now firmly established. They have been in the throes of war for years and are feeble and puny, financially and in every other sense. It would not be possible for them to maintain themselves against the aggressions of their stronger neighbors if it were known that they would be obliged to depend solely upon their own resources for their protection.

The statement that article 10 "is the heart of the covenant" is absolutely correct. Without it there would be no assurance that the world would not again be aflame before the expiration of 10 years or that we would not again be compelled to mobilize our men and our resources, ship millions of soldiers to Europe, and there engage in another desperate struggle for our very existence.

Broadly speaking, article 10 does not involve ideas that are new or novel to us. For 96 years we have, under the Monroe doctrine, guaranteed against the aggression of any foreign power the "territorial integrity and the political independence" of the nations of this continent, and during that period we have not been obliged to fire a single shot to protect them against the attack of any such power bent on conquest. For many years after the Monroe doctrine was announced, Mexico and the Central and South American Republics were, to all intents and purposes, defenseless against attack on the part of any first-class European nation. The Holy Alliance, composed as it was in 1823 of Russia, Austria, Prussia, Spain, and France, among other nations, would have made short work of them had it not been for the fact the United States had voluntarily pledged themselves to go to their assistance. We stood beside the struggling Republics of the Americas when their future was suspended in the balance, and we must join the league and assist in sustaining the new-born free nations of Europe; and not only should we become a member of the league, but Germany, Austria, and Russia should be admitted to membership at the earliest date possible. Without the league the new Republics will soon be swallowed up, Europe will again be in battle array, and we shall be drawn into the fray at tremendous cost in lives and money, as it will be as impossible for us not to become involved in another world war as it was for us to escape the clutches of the last.

It has been declared time and again by the opponents of the league that should we enter it we shall become the policeman of Europe, and that our boys will be sent overseas to perform guard duty. I make bold to assert that no such condition will eventuate. I take it that should difficulties of a minor character arise in Europe the members of the league on that continent will take such action as may be necessary to adjust them and to avert war without calling upon us. If, however, a general conflagration should occur, we shall be called upon, but our participation will not depend upon our membership in the league, as the late war demonstrated the impossibility of the maintenance of our neutrality in a world struggle.

Let us assume, for the purposes of the discussion only, that we shall be obliged to maintain in Europe for a number of years a force of, say, 50,000 men. It is a certainty that other members of the league will have on duty a proportionate force. So far as I am concerned, I do not hesitate to say that I prefer a thousand times over to have 50,000 Americans in Europe to preserve the peace than to be compelled to send millions over there to fight and suffer and die after war has broken out.

The "territorial integrity" that is guaranteed by article 10 is against "external aggression" only, and no man who is honest with himself will say that it guarantees the "territorial integrity" of any nation as against internal aggression.

The objects and purposes of the league are clearly set forth in the preamble of the covenant, which reads, in part, as follows:

> The high contracting parties, in order to promote international cooperation and to achieve international peace and security, * * * agree to this covenant of the league of nations.

Under the familiar rule of construction each and every provision of the covenant must be so construed as to accomplish the objects and purposes for which the league is organized, one of them being "to achieve international peace and security"; that is, peace and security as between nations.

It is as plain as the noon-day sun that the people of a component part of any nation entering the league may change the boundaries thereof, the "territorial integrity," as the covenant phrases it, and establish a separate government without interference on the part of the league of either a military or an economic character. Such change may be brought about by mutual agreement or by successful revolution. Those facts are too apparent to admit of argument, hence I shall not dwell upon them.

It is true, however, that in the event certain of the people of a country revolt for the purpose of setting up a separate government and another nation should go to their aid, the nation attacked has the right, through the league, to demand that other members of the league come to her assistance, and they are obliged to respond. Whether such aid shall be in the nature of economic pressure or of an armed force, or shall take some other form, is for the government of each nation to determine for itself, but I am frank enough to admit that, in my opinion, should force of arms be necessary to prevent the dismemberment of the nation assailed it must be exerted.

It is because of those facts that every effort is being made to induce those of our citizens of Irish birth or descent to oppose the league, in the belief it will make impossible the independence of Ireland.

It is well known that there are a number of men in this Chamber, particularly on the Democratic side, in whose veins runs Irish blood, who entertain the hope that is almost passion in its intensity that the day will come when Ireland will take her place in the family of nations and be permitted to work out her destiny free and untrammeled.

Our fathers entertained that same hope, and I trust that I may live to see it realized.

I appreciate the fact that the people of Ireland are torn asunder by dissensions that are largely the result of religious antagonisms. As I am not a church member, such differences do not concern me personally, and I am looking forward to the time when they will be composed and all Irishmen will unite their efforts to bring about the independence of their country. History tells us that great Protestants, among others Wolfe Tone, Emmett, Grattan, and Parnell, joined hands with their equally great Catholic brothers and, actuated solely by love of freedom and love of Ireland, all of them devoted their lives to the service of their people.

The people of the United States are lovers of liberty, and that they sympathize with the aspirations for independence of about three-fourths of the inhabitants of Ireland has been demonstrated on many occasions and in many ways, and England can render no greater service to the world than to bring about a satisfactory solution of the Irish question, which is and will continue to be, until amicably adjusted, a plague spot on the friendly relations existing between the two nations.

The wrongs and injustices visited upon Ireland, the history of the American colonies, of the Revolutionary War, and the War of 1812, engendered a bitter prejudice against England in the minds of our people, particularly those of Irish birth or extraction, but advancing years have cooled my blood and sobered my judgment to a great extent, and I am looking at the pending treaty solely from the standpoint of an American who is earnestly seeking to advance the best interests of his country and the world at large.

I desire to be entirely fair in this matter, and while I hold no brief for England I submit that as Americans we must take cognizance of the fact that in our language and our common law we and the English are one people.

As Americans we must not forget that when, during the War with Spain, Commodore Dewey was in Manila Bay, thousands of miles from home, the German Admiral von Diedrichs, in command of a squadron superior in strength to Dewey's, took possession of a lighthouse, interfered with the operations being conducted by the insurgents against the Spaniards, did not respect the laws of blockade with regard to anchorage and otherwise, with the purpose, apparently, of precipitating trouble, and that, according to the reports of those and later days, Capt. Chichester, who commanded two British cruisers, gave Von Diedrichs to understand that if he entered into an engagement with Dewey he would be obliged to fight the combined British and American forces.

Without detracting in the slightest degree from the invaluable and heroic services rendered to the common cause by each and all of the nations arrayed against the Central Powers, I say that, as Americans, we are bound to take notice of the fact that but for the British fleet and the millions of men in British uniforms who flocked to the feast of death in France and Flanders the other countries at war with Germany would have been overwhelmed during the first two and a half years of the struggle, liberty would have been destroyed in large measure throughout the world, and we would to-day, in all probability, be paying tribute in the form of indemnity to the Kaiser.

It is true, however, that when we entered the war the situation in Europe was not reassuring and, it is admitted, that during the spring and early summer of 1918 our allies were fighting with the courage born of desperation and with their "backs to the wall," according to Sir Douglas Haig. We can understand their feeling of gratitude, satisfaction, confidence, and renewed hope when our boys poured into France by the hundred thousand. They took their places in the battle line beside our friends, and by their numbers, their enthusiasm, bravery, and fighting qualities made victory certain. Among them were tens of thousands of Irish and they, as did all their comrades, risked life and limb and shed their blood freely in order that freedom and civilization should not "perish from the earth." In fighting for us and our salvation they were also fighting for the salvation of our allies, including Great Britain, therefore we have good and sufficient reason to hope and to expect that Great Britain will satisfactorily arrange the Irish matter. I believe that public opinion in this country and the viewpoint from which world affairs will be considered in the new era upon which we are about to enter, will have much to do with the accomplishment of that result.

Mr. President, the second paragraph of article 11 of the covenant is as follows:

> It is declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

There are in this country probably 15,000,000 people of Irish birth or extraction and probably four times that number who are in sympathy with the Irish cause, and continued agitation of the Irish question may tend "to disturb * * * the good understanding" between ourselves and Great Britain. I earnestly contend that under the language of the paragraph of article 11, above quoted, either our Government or any other league member can bring the matter "to the attention of the assembly or of the council" in the exercise of what is expressly declared to be a "friendly right."

I realize that neither the assembly nor the council is empowered to take any action in the premises, that they can do nothing more than advise, and can only do that by unanimous vote, but I believe a hearing on the question or the mere fact that it has been presented will have a beneficial effect and will lead to the formulation of a plan of adjustment that will be adopted by the interested parties.

I desire to submit another thought in connection with this subject for the consideration of Senators.

Prior to and during the progress of the War of the Revolution, throughout England there was a widespread sympathy for the American colonists. That sympathy was expressed in Parliament and elsewhere. In my opinion there is to-day a very considerable part of the population of England that is in accord with the desire of the Irish for self-government. That sympathy, however, does not now and in the very nature of things will not find expression so long as present conditions exist, for the reason there is a deep-rooted belief in the minds of Englishmen that if wars are to continue, if no action is to be taken by the nations of the earth to guarantee future peace, the domination of Ireland by Great Britain is a matter of self-preservation.

The English viewpoint is that, as Ireland contains a population of but four millions, if she were independent she would be at the mercy of any of the larger nations of Europe; that she would have no navy, as navies are now known; that she would have but a small army, and, if attacked, would be overrun and devastated as were Belgium, France, Italy, Serbia, and Roumania during the late war; that her people would have no avenue of retreat open to them, and would, of necessity, be compelled to yield to overwhelming numbers and resources and submit to their conquerors, who would then be in an advantageous position to spring at the very throat of the British Empire, should they so desire.

I believe that should the league of nations come into being the fears entertained by the British with regard to an independent Ireland will be dissipated, as she would, undoubtedly, become a member of the league and would then be under its protection and no nation would attack her for the purpose of conquest only, or for the purpose of assailing England.

It is my firm conviction that every friend of Ireland should be a supporter of the league, as in it lies her most promising prospect for independence.

Senator WALSH, of Montana, in the splendid address delivered by him in the Senate on July 28, pointed out the fact that certain of the opponents of the league who are championing the cause of Ireland are most vehement in their demand that there shall be no interference on our part in the affairs of Europe and that we shall not enter into an alliance with any foreign nation.

Mr. President, opponents of the league insist that under the covenant we shall be obliged to submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the council questions of purely domestic concern, such as immigration, tariff, and naturalization of aliens who desire to become citizens. There is in my opinion no foundation on which to base that contention.

It is well known and it is not disputed that such questions are, under international law, solely within the jurisdiction of the several nations and are to be determined by them as they may deem proper, subject, of course, to any limitation they may have agreed to by treaty.

The preamble of the covenant specifically states that one means by which peace will be preserved by the league is by "the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among nations."

Paragraph 7 of article 15 of the covenant expressly excludes domestic questions from the jurisdiction of the league by providing that "if the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement."

Judge Taft in his recent letter to Hon. Will Hays, chairman of the Republican national committee, referred to a number of interpretations of covenant provisions that he had prepared in order to meet certain objections raised by Senators who are opposing our entry into the league, and, among other things, said:

> The fourth interpretation is a mere statement of international law, and the proper construction of the seventh paragraph of article 15, which is only inserted to satisfy criticism of that paragraph, based on the unfounded assumption that some tribunal of the league will be found which will declare issues in respect of immigration or the tariff to be something other than a question of domestic policy. If, as all authorities show, immigration and tariff unaffected by treaties are purely domestic questions, then it can not injure the league to say that which is undoubtedly a maxim of international law and remove the concern of those who suspect other nations of being in constant and unprincipled conspiracy against the interests of the United States.

It is also contended that the league will be a superstate, that it will be a supersovereignty. That position is untenable for the reason the league will not possess the attributes of a state, as it will not have, in itself, financial resources, the power to levy taxes for the purpose of raising revenue, or the power to raise armed forces, such as an army or navy. It will not have an executive head or a legislative body, unless the council and assembly can be so considered, and their decisions on questions of importance are merely recommendatory and must be adopted by the member nations before they become effective, and even their recommendations must be agreed upon by unanimous vote, except with respect to certain matters particularly referred to in the covenant.

Mr. President, one of the principal arguments employed by the opponents of the league is that it will be controlled by foreigners, because of the fact we shall have but one vote in nine in the council. That argument is equally applicable to every other nation represented in the council and applies with much greater force to those members not represented in that body.

The council will be composed of representatives of the following nations, permanently: The United States, France, Italy, Japan, and the British Empire—not England only, mind you, but the British Empire—and four other members selected from time to time by the assembly, each of the nine nations having one vote.

The friendship existing between ourselves and the British, the French, and Italians, particularly, has been cemented by the life-blood of tens of thousands of brave men, and I am confident that no advantage of us will be taken or sought by either of them. If I entertained a doubt that they are acting in as good faith as we are, I should not support the league for a moment, but I do not.

All important matters submitted to the council must be determined by unanimous vote. Should disputes between nations represented in the council be submitted, the representatives of the nations involved shall not vote, and the vote of the remaining council members must be unanimous.

I am free to say that if the council by such vote decides against us in any matter, I shall be strongly inclined to believe that our contention is not founded on right and justice.

Mr. President, a decidedly spirited controversy has arisen with regard to the meaning of the third paragraph of article 1 of the covenant, which provides for the withdrawal from the league of a member nation. It reads as follows:

> Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

Whatever uncertainties existed as to the proper interpretation of that paragraph were removed, in my opinion, by the statement made by President Wilson at the conference between him and the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations on August 19, as reported in the press. He said, in substance, that a nation desiring to withdraw from the league could give the required two years' notice and would at the time of withdrawal be the sole judge of whether or not it had fulfilled its international obligations and its obligations under the covenant, and that the league could not determine those matters. He also said that he was confident that was the view entertained by the framers of the covenant. As the intent of the members of the body that drafted the instrument has been ascertained, it is safe to presume that it was adopted by the peace conference with the same intent; and that being true, it must be construed in the light of that intent and with the purpose of carrying it into effect.

Permit me to say in passing that I have been unable to perceive the force of the arguments made in the Senate with respect to the distinctions between moral obligations and legal obligations under a treaty.

It strikes me that the obligation of nations to abide by the terms and provisions of a treaty is moral only. The performance of the obligations imposed rests solely and entirely on the honor, the good faith, and the good conscience of the parties. I do not understand that there can be a legal obligation for the reason there is no legal penalty imposed for a violation of the provisions of a treaty, no legal tribunal in which redress can be sought, and no legally constituted agency that can compel compliance with, or exact a penalty for noncompliance with, such provisions.

Mr. President, it is conceded that the provisions of the peace treaty relating to the league are those in which we are particularly and peculiarly interested. They have been discussed for more than six months. Everything has been said and written concerning them that can be said or written, and the people are not only familiar with them but, in my opinion, an overwhelming majority are favorable to them. I submit that the treaty should be ratified at once in order that peace may be proclaimed and an opportunity be afforded us to devote our undivided attention to the tremendously important domestic problems with which we are confronted.

Former President Taft, in his recent letter to Mr. Will Hays, ascribes much of the opposition to the league in this Chamber to partisanship and personal dislike of President Wilson. I suggest to those who are fighting the league because of either or both of those reasons that they are delaying action on the treaty and in the present state of the world they are playing with fire that may materially injure us.

The day is approaching, rapidly, I hope, when the fate of the league of nations will be determined by the Members of this body. On that day each of us must decide whether he will follow the banner of the Prince of Peace or whether he will enlist under the standard of the god of war, knowing full well that the rejection of the treaty will lead certainly and inevitably to a more awful catastrophe than that from which we are now emerging.

The weight of a tremendous and fateful responsibility rests upon us, and each of us must answer to his God and his conscience for the vote he will cast.

As for me, my duty is plain. I shall vote for ratification of the treaty, thereby doing all that it is possible for me to do to bring the league into existence, and having done so, when my "summons comes to join the innumerable caravan," the moans and groans of men in agony, stricken in battles that I might have averted, the weeping of wives and mothers and the wailing of orphans will not ring in my ears, nor will a multitude of voices chide and rebuke me as being faithless to humanity and to reason.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PAGE presented a memorial of the congregation of St. Patrick's Church, of Fairfield, Vt., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Commitee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of Local Lodge No. 96, American Order United Workmen, of Chanute, Kans., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I ask that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

The joint resolution is as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, by unanimous consent I desire to have inserted in the RECORD a copy of some resolutions adopted by the American Defense Society August 23.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN DEFENSE SOCIETY (INC.),
New York, August 23, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the board of trustees of the American Defense Society, held on August 21, a committee of the board reported the following resolution, which was approved, and a copy ordered sent to each Member of the United States Senate. The resolution is as follows:

"The American Defense Society respectfully requests the Senate of the United States to reject the so-called 'covenant' and eliminate it from the treaty of peace with Germany, and in place thereof request the appointment by the nations which have warred against Germany, of committees to perform those duties under the treaty necessary to regulate the carrying out by Germany of its terms. The covenant can be eliminated from the treaty with which it has been mechanically, but not integrally, interwoven, for the reason that it is a mechanical interweaving only. The two have different aims and different intents, and they deal with subjects not interrelated in their essence. The peace conference, now in session, has full power to substitute the machinery of committees for that of the covenant. Any claim that the treaty and the covenant are interdependent in an integral sense would hardly be ingenuous, for the intent to mechanically interweave for the purpose of preventing their separate consideration was declared beforehand.

"Certain of the serious objections to the covenant are:

"1. The covenant involves, in already known and in as yet unrecognized directions, both definite and undefined surrenders of sovereignty; therein it is obnoxious to the Constitution of the United States and thereby subversive of the independence of this Nation. A distinguished advocate of the covenant has claimed that these evils can be nullified in that the covenant can be entered upon and its obligations rendered nugatory by our veto. If this be true, and it is more than doubtful, a proposal that the United States should enter into an agreement not intended in good faith to be carried out should not be entertained.

"2. Other nations should have no voice in interpreting the Monroe doctrine, nor as to the size of our Army or our Navy, nor as to what limitations this Nation may deem essential to impose upon immigration or the importation of goods.

"3. The proposal to commit this country to a blind, general upholding of the regional understandings which now exist, as well through open as possibly through still secret treaties and less formal agreements, and whereby there are created spheres of influence in favor of various nations over various portions of the earth now occcupied by less advanced people, is an abomination; and this whether such undertaking on our part does or does not constitute the consideration of a bargain for a quasi-recognition of the Monroe doctrine in the covenant by its erroneous recital as a regional understanding.

"4. There are deliberate traps in several places in the phraseology in the covenant. Examples are: The power of the council in article 10 to "advise upon," not whether steps shall be taken but the means to be employed in certain contingencies, so also the right to "deal with," matters provided for in another article. Each phrase imports the power to act while avoiding the explicit recital of the power.

"5. Concerning reservations it is called to your attention that attempted reservations in connection with partial surrenders of sovereignty have been heretofore declared to be void and of no effect by the Supreme Court of the United States and are idle and ineffective except as they may be deemed to morally justify a subsequent refusal in a given case to comply with requirements. Meanwhile, any such refusals on our part which might occur would be fruitful sources of grave international complications if we have accepted the covenant as a whole.

"6. The evil results to us which will follow our adoption of the covenant are becoming apparent. Not only must we, if we adopt the covenant, at our peril guarantee Thrace to Bulgaria (our late enemy) or to Greece (our late friend), and if necessary engage in war to maintain our award, but also, at our peril, Fiume to the Croats (our late enemies) or to Italy (our late friend), and if necessary make war to sustain our decision. Not to weary with enumeration, Albania, Northern Epirus, Syria, Anatolia, the Dodecanessus, Palestine, Lithuania, Livonia, Esthonia, Ukrainia, Carpatho-Russia, and the abodes of 20 other tribes clamor for a definite disposition of their political futures into their own hands or to one or another among the rival claimants to their possession or domination, and we must at our peril guarantee by war the errors that in our human ignorance we and the others composing the league shall assuredly commit in deciding these dubious questions.

"7. Numerous racial and social wars are already being waged in Europe. In any one of them we may be called upon to intervene. Rebellions have been fomented in several countries under the stimulus of the socialistic doctrines which have been given prominence and for which the covenant is a stalking horse.

"8. The foundation of several hundred wars within the next century or two has been securely laid by the nominal adoption, the partial application of, and the partial refusal to apply the impossible doctrine of the self-determination of races which is contrary to our fundamental doctrines as a Nation.

"9. Racial animosities have been kindled and intensified from which new racial difficulties are arising almost daily; social, racial, and civil wars will continue to spring up on every hand. Race has been arrayed against race in many countries. The keynote of the doctrine which has been so widely advocated and so persistently urged, and to the conditions created by which the covenant if adopted will apply, is an open and complete reversal of the major principle upon which America has been founded and upon which it has maintained itself and progressed to the benefit of all the races of the earth by the example afforded. In ratifying the covenant and undertaking duties under it we would do so at a time when as said above there has already been put into partial operation a principle which makes for world-wide disunion and for disunity of thought, progress, and feeling among the peoples of the earth. That principle is the fostering and intensifying of race divergencies, of the differences of language, of customs, and development of the various nations, races, and peoples. Therefrom, as night follows day, since man was young and to our knowledge for a number of thousands of years, have ever arisen enmities and war. Having created the certainty of war, in ignorance of history, in defiance of experience, in disregard of reason, shall we expect these common enemies, in their joint disunion and in the divergence of their respective material interests, jointly to restrain each the other in turn from attacking each the other? To adopt the covenant and to simultaneously advocate race consciousness, the self-determination of peoples, and the multiplication of nations is not the part of wisdom.

"10. This country has been of some value to the world through the very fact of her welcoming individuals of many races to her free and liberal institutions while keeping aloof from all this pandemonium of tribal conflict, of constant racial adjustment and readjustment. The real and not visionary element of value to humanity, the example which this country has afforded, it is now proposed should be thrown away for a dream, and in place thereof it is proposed that we should give our promise to concern ourselves in the adjustment of every racial controversy between foreign tribes that must and will arise as they in turn become respectively the stronger and the weaker. This country's voice has had some influence for the reason alone that it was not concerned in their controversies. This has been a known, conceded, and definite advantage to all nations. Already, through our intermeddling in what does not concern us and as to much of which we are incompetent to judge, we have lost in part the gain of 150 years. It is sought to throw away substance and grasp at a shadow.

STRIKES OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for permission to send to the desk and have read into the RECORD a document entitled "General Circular No. 2 to the officers and members of the railroad locals of certain brotherhoods," which I think will interest the public.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES' DEPARTMENT, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

To the officers and members of the railroad locals of the International Association of Machinists; International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers; International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron-Ship Builders, and Helpers; Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers' International Alliance; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Brotherhood Railway Carmen of America, under control of the Railroad Administration and the Canadian War Board.

NATIONAL AGREEMENT NEGOTIATIONS—GENERAL CIRCULAR NO. 2.

As advised in Circular No. 1, the executive council of the railway employees' department of the American Federation of Labor and your national agreement committee met the director general and his associates on Monday, August 18, 1919.

On Wednesday we completed the presentation of our case for increases in rates of pay as set forth in the original proposition presented January 7, 1919. This is the first opportunity we have had to fully present our request to the director general since he was authorized by the President and Congress to settle these questions.

We pointed to the higher rates paid in outside industries, other than shipyards, navy yards, and arsenals, and insisted that our members had during prewar times enjoyed rates at least equal to those paid in these industries, while at this time our rates were very much lower.

We quoted minimum rates for shipyards, navy yards, and arsenals effective as of August and October, 1918, with higher rates for repair and night work. We stated that these rates were not war emergency rates, and proved this, in our opinion, by citing the recent increases added to these rates for the Pacific coast yards, which resulted from negotiations between the metal trades department and private shipyard owners.

The ever-increasing cost of living was also presented as a reason why our original request should be granted for 85 cents for mechanics, 60 cents for helpers, and 35 cents for apprentices, effective January 1, 1919.

We again insisted upon prompt action on the part of the Railroad Administration, and pointed to the danger of delay. Director General Hines advised at the close of the conference Wednesday that he had secured much valuable information that would be extremely helpful to him in arriving at his decision on wage increase, and that he would notify your representatives when he would be prepared to present to us his proposition. We have every reason to believe this conference will be held within the next day or two, at which time we expect the director general to submit to us his first proposition on wage increases.

To avoid all possible delay, your committee is preparing itself for negotiations on national agreement after the wage increase is settled; also tabulating strike ballots, which are arriving daily.

No stoppage of work must occur. If a strike is authorized by the vote now being taken and it becomes necessary to strike to secure a just settlement, the day, hour, and other necessary instructions will be issued by the railway employees' department of the American Federation of Labor.

Pay no attention to any rumors, statements, or information coming from any other source. You will be kept fully advised by us of progress made.

With very best wishes and kindest regards,

Yours, fraternally,

J. F. ANDERSON,
International Association of Machinists.
F. C. BOLAM,
International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers.
WM. ATKINSON,
International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron-Ship Builders and Helpers of America.
J. M. BURNS,
Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers' International Alliance.
JAMES P. NOONAN,
International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.
MARTIN F. RYAN,
Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America.
B. M. JEWELL,
Acting President, Railway Employees' Department, American Federation of Labor.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 21, 1919.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it may not be out of place to remind the Senate that one of the instructions outlined in the circular just read seems to have been completely disregarded at Los Angeles, Calif., where a strike of railway employees resulted in an enormous congestion in the yards of a vast quantity of perishable foodstuffs, consisting, in part, of animals which must be fed and watered, and which are going to ruin and decay through the inability of the few nonstriking railway people to look after them, and because citizens are not permitted to give their services to the averting of a common and a very imminent tragedy.

I am apprehensive that the circular which I introduced on Saturday and followed by this one indicates the certainty, or at least the serious contemplation, of a universal strike in transportation quarters in the very near future. I hope that the Government of the United States, representing all the people, whose duty it is to enforce the laws, will not wait until this threat materializes, but will take steps to anticipate it by providing for the operation of trains in the country upon which all must depend not only for the ordinary requirements of life but for its necessities as well.

CARS FOR COAL SHIPMENTS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the question of car supply in the coal trade has attracted a good deal of attention here during the last week or two; and the other day a report was made by Mr. Hines, in response to a resolution which the Senate passed, calling upon him for information in that behalf. That has been printed as a document. I have been pursuing this matter somewhat further, and I have quite a number of letters and telegrams on the subject. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to refer to them; but I have before me a letter which I received on Saturday from the Director of the Geological Survey bearing upon this subject of car supply, and accompanying this letter is a table in which he gives the percentage of full-time operation lost because of car shortage by the week during the month of July and up to and including August 9. This shows that the car shortage has been worse during July and August, 1919, than it was during the corresponding weeks of July and the early part of August, 1918. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read this letter and the table, but I desire that they be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, August 23, 1919.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR POMERENE: In reply to your letter of August 21, the Geological Survey receives reports from a majority of the bituminous coal operators in the country each week, giving their production and for each mine the number of hours worked and lost, the causes of nonoperation being classified as due to car shortage, labor shortage or strikes, mine disability, and lack of market. The individual reports are compiled in the Geological Survey with district totals and weighted averages obtained. There is inclosed a table, taken from the published reports of the Geological Survey, showing the percentages of time lost because of car shortage in the eastern fields to which your letter refers, by weeks, in July and August to date, this year compared with last. There is also inclosed a copy of the report of this date for all districts of the country.

You will note that, as you have surmised, in these eastern fields lack of cars is curtailing output by from 30 to 50 per cent, and that the situation in this respect is now worse than last year. In the more recent weeks transportation difficulty has been greatly aggravated in some areas by the strikes on the railroads.

Yours, very cordially,

GEO. OTIS SMITH,
Director.

Percentage of full-time operation lost because of car shortage.

PASSPORT-CONTROL ACT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, suggesting that the passport-control act of May 22, 1918, be extended for one year after peace shall have been concluded between the United States and the Central Powers of Europe, and that ample appropriation be made for an efficient execution of that act and the regulations made under it during the remainder of the fiscal year.

This recommendation brings up for your consideration a very important question of policy which has an intimate relation to the welfare of the country. Information from the agents of the Government in foreign countries indicates that as soon as the existing restrictions upon travel are removed many persons will seek admission to this country, and that among the number are not only persons undesirable from the point of view of becoming future citizens but persons whose origin and affiliations make it inadvisable that they should be permitted to enter the United States. The act of May 22, 1918, which makes possible the prevention of undesirable individuals from departing for the United States will automatically cease to be operative upon the establishment of a condition of peace. Individuals will then be free to come here for whatever purpose they choose, and many will come for purposes which we can not approve and which may indeed be dangerous to the country and to its institutions. The immigration officials enforcing the immigration laws at the ports of the United States will not be able successfully to prevent the entry of all improper and dangerous persons because of the impracticability of developing a system of intelligence and investigation abroad to work in sufficiently close relationship to the immigration organization in the United States to be thoroughly effective in distinguishing between those individuals whose right to admission would be injurious to the country. The experience gained during the war shows that an efficient system of passport control administered by the Department of State through the diplomatic and consular officers in foreign countries can be depended upon to exclude practically all persons whose admission to the United States would be dangerous or contrary to the public interest. If the Congress concur in the view that the national welfare requires that the class of persons to which I have alluded should not enter this country, it is my belief that the simplest and most effective method that can be adopted would be to continue the system of control now being carried on by the Department of State, working in close cooperation with the Commissioner General of Immigration.

It is obvious that effectiveness of control can only be obtained through supplementing the regular diplomatic and consular personnel with a sufficient number of reliable and capable men, and such men as would be useful can be had only through the payment of adequate compensation. The Secretary of State estimates the expenditure required for the remainder of the current fiscal year at $750,000, including a number of additional employees in the Department of State who would be charged to supplement the administrative organization now maintained there. I quite agree with the view that it is entirely useless to make any outlay upon this work unless sufficient money is provided with which to make control effective. It would be most unwise to permit the public to rest under the impression that an effective control was being exerted over persons seeking admission to this country, when in fact, owing to inadequate personnel and an inefficient administration of the law, dangerous persons were freely crossing our boundaries.

It is important that I should add that the increase in the number of persons desiring to come to the United States has already almost overwhelmed the existing organization abroad, and that it is very doubtful whether the system of control can be kept in operation for more than a few weeks longer without additional appropriation.

With the relaxation of restrictions upon transportation which are gradually taking place, the burden of examining applicants passport visas will become so great as to be entirely beyond the capacity of the number of officers whose employment existing appropriations make possible. Therefore it is of the utmost importance that if the Congress should decide, as I hope it may, that the public interest requires that the existing system of control should be maintained and extended it will enact the necessary legislation preferably by joint resolution and make ample appropriation at the earliest possible moment.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
25 August, 1919.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The message is accompanied by a report from the Secretary of State on the same subject. The message will be printed in the RECORD, and with the report will be referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, during the war a measure was reported from the Judiciary Committee dealing with the question of passports. It occurs to me that as the message relates to the same subject probably it ought to go to the Judiciary Committee. I suggest that reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah make a motion to that effect?

Mr. KING. Yes; I move that the message and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSFER OF SHANTUNG TO JAPAN.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to give notice at this time that to-morrow morning, after the close of routine morning business, I shall submit some remarks concerning the injustice as well as the impropriety of the proposed committee amendment to the Shantung provision of the treaty of peace.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 25, strike out the words "nor more than 20 cents per ton."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. It refers to the royalty upon coal. I wish to say also that the royalty upon coal in the United States averages to-day about 10½ cents per ton.

The Public Lands Committee reported this bill with a minimum of 5 cents and a maximum of 20 cents per ton. Everyone knows that with coal every cent of royalty paid is passed directly to the consumer. It is quite different with oil. As far as coal is concerned, whatever the amount of royalty, it is paid by the consumer.

I know of no State in the Union that is not to-day regulating the price at which coal may be sold, based upon the actual cost of production, and it is impossible to get the actual cost of production of coal without taking into consideration the royalty paid.

Therefore, Mr. President, the committee thought it was proper, as far as coal is concerned, to have a minimum and a maximum rate. A person who desires to start the operation of a new coal mine must in the majority of cases in the very beginning secure assistance from some other source than his private fortune. It may happen in one case out of a thousand that a man has enough money to develop a coal mine and put in the necessary machinery and appliances to mine the coal, but he would only be one in a thousand; the others have to borrow the money.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that it would be the height of folly and unwisdom to leave the royalty unlimited as far as coal is concerned.

The reason why we put in a minimum of 5 cents a ton is that in some sections of the country the coal veins are very narrow and the coal is very poor, but it is the best the people can get, and to charge them more than 5 cents would be unwise, unfair, and unjust.

This whole question of royalty is left to the Secretary of the Interior. If after an investigation is made he, in his judgment, thinks that 20 cents ought to be the amount paid, anything less than that could be rejected. I have no doubt that the Secretary of the Interior, the present one or any future Secretary, will guard the interests of the Government and the people of the United States in this particular.

Therefore, Mr. President, I sincerely trust that this amendment, the first amendment offered affecting coal, proposing to strike out the maximum amount, will be disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am very sure the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is actuated by the very best motives in urging this amendment, but I can not help feeling that he is not as familiar with the situation as some of the rest of us or he would not urge it.

I think it was very clearly pointed out by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that whatever royalty is imposed upon coal necessarily goes into the price at which it is sold, and consequently becomes a burden upon the consumer of coal. I presume probably 250 miles is about the limit to which coal in the West can be commercially carried. I do not know of any coal property in the West the product of which is sold at any greater distance than possibly 300 miles. In other words, whatever coal is mined under the provisions of this act is going to be utilized within a radius of 200 to 300 miles of the place at which it is produced; that is to say, the people of that community are called upon to pay whatever the royalty is into the Treasury of the United States. So this is a tax which you are seeking to levy upon the people living within 200 to 300 miles of the coal mines for the benefit of all the people of the United States.

I say "for the benefit of all the people of the United States," but really it is not for the benefit of all the people of the United States, because it long ago was an established principle that the prosperity of the whole country depends upon the prosperity of the people who live in the producing sections of the country. If the people in that section prosper, the products of Massachusetts find a market among them, and if we burden them so that they can not prosper, you will find no market for your products.

But I submit it is utterly unfair to levy what practically amounts to a tax upon the people of that section of the country for the benefit of those who live elsewhere.

The Senator is justly apprehensive about monopolistic conditions. He told us the other day that five men could gather in his section of the country and fix the price of coal, and practically fix it within the limits of anything that they see fit.

But the condition is not the same in the West, Mr. President, for the reason that I have indicated. Our distances there are very great. Coal which is mined in the State of Wyoming, both at Rock Springs and at Diamondville, is marketed in the city of Butte, the great consuming center of our State, in competition with the coal produced in our State at Red Lodge and at Roundup. Wyoming coal comes into competition with Colorado coal in Denver, so the situation is altogether different. I do not mean to say that competition is as free as it might be; but no such situation as the Senator speaks of as existing in the eastern part of the country prevails with us at all. This is in the nature of a very burdensome tax upon our people, which I trust the Senators from other sections of the country will feel they ought not to endeavor to impose upon them.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire to say but a word in addition to what I urged when this bill was last under consideration. I think the practice of inserting in any legislation the maximum royalty which the Government may collect is very bad. I can not conceive of any necessity of fixing the limit which the Government may obtain from any properties or rights that it chooses to lease or sell.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr WALSH].

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment proposed by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts was, on page 6, in line 17, to strike out the words "three hundred and twenty" and to insert "two thousand five hundred and sixty," so as to read:

Provided further, That in the case of municipal corporations the Secretary of the Interior may issue such limited license or permit for not to exceed 2,560 acres.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in view of the explanation of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] I do not care to press the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before this matter passes from the consideration of the Senate, however, I desire to correct what seems to be a mistaken impression with respect to that provision. The municipal corporation, if it desires to engage in the business of mining coal commercially for the purpose of selling it in the open market to all comers, has exactly the same opportunity as has anyone else to bid for a lease; there is no restriction at all. It can get a lease of 2,560 acres of coal land just the same as can any other corporation, or just the same as can any individual, by bidding for the privilege of the lease and paying the royalty. This is a perfectly gratuitous grant which is proposed to be given to the municipality. In the first place, we allow the homesteader to go anywhere upon the public domain where he finds coal and to take whatever he needs for his own domestic use. At any time the Government finds an opportunity to lease that coal land, however, it executes a lease, and then, of course, his right is gone; but in the case of a municipality which desires to mine coal for the use of its own citizens, without profit to itself, it is here given gratuitously the right to operate on 320 acres.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts withdraws the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In view of the explanation made by the Senator from Montana, I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

The next amendment proposed by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts was, in section 14, page 13, line 7, after the words "per centum," to strike out "nor more than 25 per cent."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate bear with me for just a moment, and I will explain why this amendment should not be agreed to. Section 14, to which the amendment is proposed, is the part of the bill which grants certain rights to a citizen of the United States to go upon the public domain outside of a known geologic structure and prospect for oil where there has been neither a report made by the Government nor even an investigation made as to whether the land could be even classed as oil lands. In fact, it refers solely to the wildcatter, the individual or corporation that is willing to go out and upon his or its own judgment spend money in a district where there is not one chance, perhaps, in a thousand of discovering oil. In section 14 individuals or corporations—and I say there is necessity for new oil fields to be discovered in the United States, and they must be discovered if we are to secure oil sufficient for our demands—are given certain privileges. First, 640 acres of the land on which oil is discovered and a lease at a royalty of 5 per cent. Then a further right, if a lease is desired, to secure the remainder of the 2,560 acres under a lease; but if that is undertaken there must be paid a minimum royalty of 12½ per cent and a maximum royalty of 25 per cent.

Mr. President, that applies only in the case of the man or corporation that goes into a country where there are no oil indications, so far as our Government has discovered, into an entirely unknown oil field, and prospects, with very little chance of discovering oil. The bill as it was first presented gave such an individual or corporation the right to take half or 1,280 acres.

That amount your committee cut down to one-quarter, or 640 acres, and as to the remaining three-fourths of the 2,560 acres, as I have said, there is a preferential right to lease. We thought that it was no more than right that an individual or a corporation that takes the chances which have to be taken should not be compelled under a lease to pay more royalty than 25 per cent.

Senators, remember that as soon as an individual or corporation finds oil in an unknown field he or they are the only ones who can get a lease in that whole field at a royalty of 5 per cent, and then only on an area of 640 acres. Therefore, I doubt whether there is a Senator, after consideration of the matter, particularly if he knows of the conditions existing and the requirements that must be met in order to discover oil, and particularly the chances that such prospectors run in going upon the public domain, with no report from their Government stating in any way that there is an indication of oil—I do not believe there is any Senator who will not admit that the terms imposed in this section are as drastic as they ought to be upon any individual or corporation who undertakes such work.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, all I desire to say in addition to what I have said in connection with the question of maximum royalties is that this is the first time I have ever heard—I have not had as much experience in dealing with questions affecting public lands as my fellow Senators—but this is the first time in the affairs of private life or in public life that I ever knew the owner of property or rights of uncertain value saying to an agent, "You can sell or lease my property only up to a certain maximum rate. I do not want you to get for me regardless of possible value more than a fixed maximum," instead of leaving the agent free to get all that it is possible for him to get for the owner or lessor. That is the principle behind the fixing of maximum royalties. It is restricting, in case great deposits of valuable oils or minerals being discovered, the actual amount the Government can obtain for its valuable rights.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator must understand that the title of this land does not pass from the United States and that the value of the land is made by the individual who discovers the oil. The land is not worth a dollar and a quarter an acre to-day to the Government or her citizens. If an individual desired to do a similar work for an individual who owned such land the landowner would say, "Go on and develop the land, and if you discover oil I will give you outright a portion of it and I will make my money out of the balance of the land."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, we can more readily understand the purpose of provisions of this kind possibly by some illustrations of a concrete nature. Texas has had a great oil boom recently and is now first among the oil-producing States of the Union. In the Ranger field, in the Burk-Burnett field, and in the other great producing fields of Texas there is no lease, so far as I know, for which a greater royalty than one-eighth is paid, and that is upon not Government land at all, not even State land, but land belonging to private individuals.

In the State of New Mexico there is now not what might be called a boom, perhaps, but qute a lot of excitement about oil, and the same thing is true of Arizona. Those States are known as desert States; and I wish to ask the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts for a moment that I may explain some conditions with which probably he is not at all familiar. In the southern portion of what is known as the Tularosa Basin, for instance, running to the Texas line and extending north and west through New Mexico, there is found what is known as Pennsylvania sand formation, apparently a very favorable formation for oil. A large portion of this area, approximately, I should say, two million and a half acres, is upon the public domain. Under the law to-day any individual can take 20 acres in a unit as an oil claim for prospecting purposes, and associations of individuals can take 160 acres, and associations and individuals can take as many units as they desire. There is no time limit in which prospecting for the oil may be carried on; but, nevertheless, the citizens of that section in their desire to develop the country have acquired a great many placer rights upon the public domain. Each of them has found one difficulty to begin with staring him in the face, namely, that near none of the claims which he could take is it possible, in the first instance, to secure water with which to feed the boilers in order to produce steam for running engines for drilling purposes. In the center of the Tularosa Valley water has been discovered at a depth of 980 feet, but that water can not be used at all for boiler purposes, it being too heavily impregnated with minerals. The same condition exists throughout the entire valley.

In some of the canyons of the mountains pure water suitable for boiler use can be discovered. The Rock Island Railroad, in connection with its extension, the El Paso North Western Road, have found that from Tucumcari, N. Mex., within 100 miles or so of the northern border of New Mexico, south for 300 miles they could not use the water anywhere along the railroad for boiler purposes, except at two points, one at Alamogordo and the other at Three Rivers, N. Mex. In each instance it was necessary, in order to get water for boiler purposes, to pipe the water a distance of 14 miles from Three Rivers and 40 miles from Alamogordo. To secure the amount of water necessary with which to run trains it is necessary for them to go entirely across a great mountain range, which reaches an altitude of 12,003 feet, and to establish a system there by which they obtain pure water, conduct it into reservoirs, and pump it from 150 to 250 miles. They put in a plant alone which cost them to start with $1,250,000. They had to secure rights of way across Indian reservations and forest reserves for the pipe line. Now, what is an individual going to do in undertaking to develop oil in this desert country when he must secure water for boiler purposes to generate steam for power purposes?

Another matter to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts is that in the Ranger field, the Burk-Burnett, and other fields in Texas, which are the nearest oil fields to New Mexico, it is possible to secure by contract the drilling of a well approximately 2,000 feet in depth for the sum of $60,000. The contractor takes possession of the land and delivers a well 2,000 feet deep—either a dry well or an oil well—at a fixed sum approximating a minimum of $60,000, and from that ranging to $80,000. The financing of the first oil well which was attempted in the Tularosa Basin, N. Mex., was based upon those figures; that is, upon $80,000 being paid for the drilling of the well. Upon the geological report and the practical report of the oil drillers, however, the individuals who, without seeking outside aid or capital, had put their own money in to the extent of $80,000 were told before they proceeded to spend one cent in this undeveloped region that it would be necessary for them to advance $150,000; that the well would not be dug and no contractor would take a contract under $150,000. The matter was reported to the individual stockholders, and amongst themselves they raised the additional sum, and they are now proposing to dig a well. They are confronted with the legal propositions, which it is hoped this bill will enable them to meet.

The point that I desire to make is that these pioneers must first pay twice as much money for a well of the same depth as is paid in a known field, or where the well is close to railroad communication, where the derricks, the heavy timbers, and the heavy machinery can be shipped in, and where water which can be utilized for boiler purposes is close at hand. They must have the water. They can not drill the well otherwise. It is now contemplated—and, in fact, it has been done—to haul the water from the railroad at Alamogordo 40 miles out on the desert in tank cars mounted upon trucks for the purpose of furnishing water for boiler purposes with which to generate steam. It is impossible to get it closer unless the well sunk is sunk nearer to the water supply.

These are the conditions that confront us. You can not get away from them. The Government of the United States is not assisting us in securing a supply of water. Everything is being done by individual effort. In order to finance a proposition of this kind you must seek, generally, outside capital.

In the approach to financiers in Boston, Mass., in Baltimore, Md., and in New York for the purpose of securing financial assistance in developing one of those fields they have required first in every instance, before they would contract to do the development work or to put up the amount of money necessary to sink the well, a contract for the exploration of 10,000 acres of land instead of 2,500, as in this bill provided; otherwise they would not be justified in wildcatting, as they claim, in a new, not understood area.

In the second place, to say to them that you leave in the discretion of anyone the authority to charge them more than 25 per cent royalty when they do discover the oil would be to preclude obtaining any such financial assistance. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], as a business man, would not put his money in an undeveloped area under the conditions that I have described, if he knew that immediately upon the discovery by him of oil on the 2,500-acre location area or prospecting area which is given him in this bill he would immediately be cut down to 640 acres, and that if he sought to exploit the balance of it the royalty might be put up to 50 or 75 per cent, or any other prohibitive amount. So long as that discretion is left to increase the royalty beyond the point where it would pay for the development of the balance of the area he will not put in his money, even with an assurance that he can develop oil on 640 acres at a reasonable price.

It is these practical matters that confront we people from the West, and we have had practical, actual experience with them; and for that reason we have agreed upon the provisions here.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the remarks of my esteemed friend the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are calculated to leave a very erroneous impression concerning this provision of the bill and calculated to bring the legislation itself into very undeserved disrepute.

Let me say that the conditions dealt with in the section under consideration, section 14, are not at all analogous to the case that he puts of a man who has a piece of property and he puts it in the hands of an agent for sale, and fixes a minimum price, but never fixes the maximum. That situation of affairs has no kind of application to the questions that are before us.

The preceding section, Mr. President, section 13, authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to give to anyone a prospecting permit covering 2,560 acres of land, four sections. He may go upon that land and sink wells and endeavor to find oil. That is section 13. Under section 14, if he discovers oil within the limit of his permit we give him, without any royalty at all, a lease on a quarter of his permit, 640 acres. He does not have to pay anything for the royalty. We give him that as a reward for his energy and for his enterprise and for the risk that he takes.

Here are altogether 40,000,000 acres of land out West that may contain oil. Nobody knows. The Government of the United States is not going to take any chances upon drilling over this 40,000,000 acres for the purpose of discovering oil. The Government of the United States can not afford to go into the oil-prospecting business. It would be an awful abuse; it would be an imposition upon the taxpayers of this country to take money out of the Treasury and utilize it in prospecting for oil, everywhere recognized as so hazardous a business that a trustee would be subject to criminal prosecution if he put the trust funds intrusted to his care in an enterprise of that character; and accordingly by this measure we invite anybody who desires to take the hazard, who is willing to take the chance, to go out on this 40,000,000 acres of land, taking a prospecting permit covering 2,560 acres, and take his chances.

If he finds oil we give him a lease on 640 acres, and then we say to him also, "On the other three sections we will give you a further lease. The amount of royalty which you are to pay on that we will fix at the time we give you the lease, but it will not be less than 12½ per cent, and it will not be more than 25 per cent."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senators pardon me? I will yield in just a moment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; in just one moment. Now, this man has gone on and by his foresight, his enterprise, and by reason of the risk and the hazard that he has run, he has demonstrated that there is oil in that field. That field may cover thousands of acres. The rest of it then becomes exceedingly valuable to the Government, and it proceeds to lease all the rest of the land within that geological area under the provisions of the next succeeding section, which provides that the royalty shall not be less than 12½ per cent, and it may go skyhigh. Now, the question is, Is that a good business proposition? Is it a good business proposition to say to your agent, "You can hold out to anybody in the world, being a citizen of the United States, the opportunity to come here and prospect his land and get his permit. He shall get a lease of 640 acres, for which he pays no royalty"——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator is wrong there. That is what I wanted to call to his attention. The Senator inadvertently says there is no royalty. There is a royalty of 5 per cent on the 640 acres.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Five per cent—that is correct. He pays a royalty of 5 per cent even upon the 640 acres, and then you can say to him also, "We will give him a lease upon the other three sections against anybody else. He may take it or not, as he pleases. If he takes it we will give him a lease upon the rest of it for not less than 12½ nor more than 25 per cent; but on everything outside of that prospecting permit we will charge not less than 12½ per cent, and we will charge any figure we please that is higher than that."

Now, it is a mere question as to how much inducement it becomes necessary to offer to the prospector. You will bear in mind that with respect to all other of our mineral resources a different situation prevails. The statement has been made upon the floor here that this is the last of our great natural resources that we are disposing of. That is a very serious error, Mr. President. We have vast resources; we have mineral lands of vast extent that contain gold, silver, copper, lead, zinc, cinnabar, and other metals of that character; and with respect to all of those, doubtless at least as great an area as there is here, we say to the prospector, "We will give you anything you find." He can go out there and if he finds any public land containing any of these metals he may locate a claim 1,500 feet in length and 600 feet in width, and he may locate just as many of those as he pleases, and when he sinks a shaft and finds the metal, and he demonstrates that it is there and he does $500 worth of work upon that claim, we give him the property.

We were always accustomed to do the same thing in respect to all of these things, except in the case of coal. Oil land was disposed of at $5 an acre. That is the way, as has been repeatedly said, in which the West has been built up, and we propose to continue that policy with respect to all the lands containing the metalliferous minerals. There is not any disposition anywhere to change that policy.

With respect to oil, we have got to hold out some inducement to the prospector. Now, Mr. President, I inquire if the Senator from Massachusetts, whom I give credit for the very highest purposes in this matter, believes that we are offering too much to the man who takes all these chances, who runs all the risk, who expends in the work that he is conducting oftentimes thousands of dollars, and then does not get a thing? I do not know what the figures are, but of course everybody knows that there is not 1 well, perhaps, in 10 that brings in oil, and certainly not 1 in 5 even in a developed field, because you may not hit the region that will give up the oil; but in a perfectly undeveloped field I inquire if the chances are not that we are making it altogether too burdensome to him; that we do not offer him inducements enough? But certainly no one can complain when we say to the prospector, "We will give you a lease on 640 acres of your permit at 5 per cent, and with respect to the rest we will give you a preference above everybody else on a royalty not less than 12½ nor more than 25 per cent."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

It has taken me two or three years to overcome the objections that I have had to the whole scheme of leasing the public domain. We got along very well under the old laws, and developed the western country. Ever since the new ideas have come into being we have not developed much, and we will develop less every year that you put another embargo on it.

I consent to vote for this bill simply because it is the best possible thing we can get out of it for the people of the United States, and I resent the suggestion that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and myself have nothing but a mere local interest at stake in this matter. We know the conditions. I do not like the leasing business at all, for, in my judgment, no land ever yet has been or ever will be developed under it; and instead of increasing the royalty above 25 per cent I would certainly, if I had my way about it, leave it absolutely free to the man who made a discovery in an unknown field.

I merely wanted to go on record as saying that I vote for this bill under one condition, and one only, and that is because it is the very best thing, after these years of labor, that could be gotten out of the conditions that have been thrown around the development of these western resources. If there were any possibility of getting it better, I certainly would oppose the bill from first to last. Like others, I see no opportunity of doing anything better than this bill proposes; and I congratulate the committee, before whom I had very few opportunities to appear in the last formation of the bill, on what it has been enabled to do for the development, even in this way, of the resources that have been held absolutely from the use of the people.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHIPPS. I desire to offer an amendment in the form of a new section.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator wait until we get through with the amendments offered by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PHIPPS. Certainly. I was under the impression that they had been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 23, strike out "20" and insert "5," so as to read:

Leases shall be for a period of 5 years, with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for successive periods of 10 years—

And so forth.

"Ten," in line 25, is proposed to be changed by another amendment to read "5," so that it will read:

Leases shall be for a period of 5 years, with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for successive periods of 5 years—

And so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want anything to happen to the bill that will make it any more unworkable than it is as now drawn. The proponents of the legislation, until within the last two or three years, have always taken the position that the life of a lease should be 50 years. That was done in order that men might secure money for the purpose of developing this class of property. A lease of 20 years it seems to me is as short a period as would allow a person to secure money to develop his claims. If leases are to be restricted to 5 years where is a man going to secure money in order to develop his property? The land involved is within a known geologic structure, and that is the reason why we in this particular section left out all reference to a permit, and the Secretary of the Interior is only authorized to make a direct lease. Twenty years is as little as it ought to be.

As to the renewal period of 10 years, that is as little as I have ever heard anyone suggest. The Secretary of the Interior in his report on all bills in the past has never suggested a lease of 5 years, nor has he suggested a renewal every 5 years, but this is a lease upon bids, or a bonus, as the case may be, in known geologic structures.

It seems to me that the time for the highest royalty or bonus to be given is when the lease is made after the discovery of oil in the known geologic structure, and if we have a renewal every 5 years and the wells become less productive during that period we will never get the royalty out of them that we would under the existing provisions.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KIRBY. Is it not true that now in regular leasing development on the outside where there is no known geological formation 5 years is the time for which leases are granted?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think so. I will say to the Senator that most of the leases are for a term during the life of the well, no matter what length of time it may be; as long as the well is producing they will have to pay the royalty as agreed. This is the case on Indian lands in the Senator's own State.

Mr. KIRBY. But they have only 5 years to develop it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not what this means. It means that the lease is to be for 5 years. The amendment which the Senator from Massachusetts has offered means that no lease will be granted for a longer term than 5 years.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In an oil field.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, in an oil field.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has the Senator from Utah finished?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I simply want to reiterate what I have been trying to say heretofore. I can understand how an argument can be made in favor of the claim that the Government is well protected under the bill in cases where small deposits of mineral or oil have been discovered of not very great value, but my contention is that in case oil of exceeding great value and coal and phosphate of exceeding great value are discovered, then the Government is likely to be a very heavy loser, because its rights are not safeguarded and protected. That is why I asked to have stricken out of the bill the maximum royalty and that is why when oil of great value is discovered I have asked that the lease be made for as small a term as possible in order that the Government may, if rich deposits are discovered, have a chance to renew its lease quickly and speedily at an enhanced value to the Government.

If I am correctly informed, when a rich oil field is discovered there is no limit to the fortunes that can be made in a five-year-term lease under the provisions of the bill. I am speaking for a short-term-lease policy, having in mind the discovery of a valuable deposit of oil and not of an oil field which may be of no special value. That is the position I take upon this amendment.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts for the reason that, in my opinion, a lease for a term of five years with renewal rights strikes me as being eminently fair and reasonable. I apprehend that as far as the oil fields are concerned, they could be entirely worked out within a period of 20 years and all the oil taken from the land, and I apprehend that the conditions might be such that at the expiration of five years the terms under which the Government leased for the original period would be entirely unfair and inequitable as far as the Government is concerned. As the bill is to be enacted for the benefit of the people, it would appear to me that the Government should at least have the right reserved to it to enter into another lease under different terms and conditions at the expiration of five years, if as a matter of fact the conditions prevailing at that time warrant it. As the man who holds the original lease has a preferential under this section to successive leases of five years upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, I am utterly unable to see that his right would be particularly jeopardized.

I think that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts should prevail.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Government itself expended money to discover a well, and then for the operation of the well offered the oil upon a bid on the royalty basis, there would be very great justice in the amendment that has been offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. But I undertake to say that there has never been a private lease of oil lands where the lessee must expend the money and find the oil where the term of the lease has been as low as five years.

The whole purpose with reference to this bill is to secure an increased production of oil upon such terms as are fair to the Government and upon such terms as will give to the people through the Government a reasonable return upon these resources which the people themselves own. I undertake to say that except possibly in a very few cases where in a field great gushers have been found not a dollar of capital could be secured to drill an oil well based upon a five-year lease with the right of the Secretary of the Interior at the end of five years to renew the lease and make such terms and conditions as might then seem best.

If the Senator from Massachusetts thought of investing in any of these oil lands, he would not think of putting a dollar into a lease of that kind where he would have to put in $50,000 or $100,000 and at the end of five years, when he would have only a small portion of his original capital returned to him in the way of profits, the lessor, whether it be the Government or a private individual, could deprive him of his entire capital invested.

After all, Mr. President, in the consideration of this question there ought to be some business principle applied. Would the Senator think that anyone in the case of a lease of property would agree to erect a building costing $50,000 if at the end of five years the lessor could readjust the terms and the rent of that property, charging him such sum as he chose?

It seems to me, much as I am in favor of protecting the interests of the public in every possible way, if we desire additional oil production upon fair terms we would never get it if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts were adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). The question is on the two amendments offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] taken as one.

The amendments were rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 2, it is proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to strike out the words "nor more than 25 per cent," so that it will read:

Shall be entitled to a lease thereon from the United States for a period of 20 years, at a royalty of not less than 12½ per cent of all the oil or gas produced and saved.

Mr. SMOOT. Just one word, Mr. President. This has reference to lands that are relinquished to the United States; that is, the right to the claims that they have is to be relinquished to the United States, and upon that relinquishment of whatever claims they have they are entitled to a lease under the provisions of this bill. In that case your committee thought that a minimum of 12½ per cent and a maximum of 25 per cent was all that the Government could justly demand under any circumstances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The amendment was rejected.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is on page 20, line 4, relative to the maximum for oil shale lands, to strike out the words "nor more than 25 per cent."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word. The Government of the United States is making every effort, as well as a great many individuals in the western part of the country, to find some system of profitably extracting oil from shale. Up to the present time there has not been such a plan or system discovered. I have no doubt that some time or other in the future such discovery will be made, but when that time arrives it does seem to me that men who want to borrow money and who have got to do it in order to erect the necessary plant, and it is going to cost not $100,000 but more than likely $1,000,000 and over, ought to be given all the encouragement possible. What I am afraid of in this very provision is that the maximum royalty is too high. I want to say first that if the United States is going to have oil for the future we have got to discover some plan for extracting it from shale, and the quicker it comes the better it will be for the people of this country.

I am quite sure, after consideration given this matter, that Senators will see the wisdom of defeating the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I want to make one final effort to amend the bill, so that some Senators, if they finally decide to vote for the bill, may be able to justify their position and not be put on the defensive. I offer the following amendment, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to amend, on page 25, at the end of line 5, by inserting the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That every permit and lease shall reserve to the Secretary of the Interior the right to limit the original issue of capital stock by the permittee to an amount corresponding at par value to the cash actually subscribed and paid therefor, and also the right to limit subsequent issues of capital stock to such amounts as he may deem compatible with the interest of the public.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Would not the amendment as the Senator offers it preclude the recognition of labor service, manual labor, and other services rendered in connection with the development of the property from being regarded as of value for which stock might be issued? The Senator will recall that in the location of these claims, in the surveys which are made, in the preliminary work which is done for the purpose of mining the claim, thousands of dollars are very often expended, indeed in many claims hundreds of thousands of dollars. A hasty reading of the amendment would seem to prevent those expenditures, legitimate and proper, from receiving consideration and being figured as worthy of compensation. I think that would be manifestly unfair. It would militate against the poor man, against the man without means, who put his time and services, toil and labor, into the enterprise.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is not my purpose to reject in the capitalization of a leasing corporation consideration and recognition of the value of the toil and labor expended in the development of these public lands. This amendment does seek to protect the people of the country against stock watering, against corporations being organized without any limit being fixed to their capitalization and worthless securities or securities of doubtful value issued and sold all over the country to innocent investors. If there has been one evil in this country that the Government could easily have legislated against and that has caused more distress and misery than any others, it is the issuing and sale of worthless securities on so-called mining and oil claims located in various parts of the country and located on properties formerly part of the public lands.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. KING. After the discovery of oil and it is ascertained that there is a valuable property, does the Senator's amendment permit the issuing of stock based upon the then cash value so nearly as that may be ascertained?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; and it seeks further, as the progress of development goes on, to permit the Secretary of the Interior to approve the expansion of the necessary capitalization of the corporation. It leaves the matter of capitalization by lessees entirely in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. KING. The Senator will understand that capital must be obtained. For instance, the getting of oil is not the only expense. Perhaps there might be a desire to have a refinery. I might say in passing, if the Senator will pardon me, that the monopoly in this country, if there is oil monopoly, does not grow out of the productive end of the enterprise; it is the refining. There is no monopoly in any production. If there is monopoly, it is in the matter of refining. Therefore, every encouragement ought to be given for the development, and also encouragement offered to the independent operator or producer that he may erect a refinery.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I move the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am in hearty sympathy with the purpose of this amendment, and if it were amended in accordance with the idea embodied in the suggestion made by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] I should be disposed to give it my support. But it ought to be amended, of course, so that property at its actual cash value or labor at its actual cash value should stand on the same footing as the cash secured. For instance, here is a man who conducts experimentation, secures a lease and sinks a well, or, better than that, he goes out and makes a geological survey of the country. He believes that within a certain area oil can be found. He is a man of experience; he is a trained scientist; he is an experienced oilman; he believes he has found a region within which oil can be discovered. He then goes to the Secretary of the Interior or to the proper land officer and secures a prospecting permit on a certain area. He has not any money. He goes to another man and tells him that he believes that oil is there; that it will take $25,000 to sink a well, and he wants the man to put up the money against his judgment, experience, and skill in the locating of it. Why should that kind of an arrangement be prohibited?

Under the proposed amendment you can not have capital except to the amount of the cash that is actually subscribed, which would leave the discoverer without any portion of it at all. Accordingly you offer no inducement whatever to the man to make the effort to find oil. The purpose of this bill is to endeavor to promote the development of these properties and to find oil upon the great area of territory, 6,000,000 acres already withdrawn, with which the bill deals. I think the amendment as it stands ought not to have the approval of the Senate, and I trust the Senator will consider the suggestions made and reframe it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not accept the proposed amendment to the bill. I think it entirely wrong as pertaining to the bill itself, nor would I be justified in accepting it if there were no other objection to it than that afforded by the statement made by the Senator from Montana. I hope the Senate will not approve of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I present an amendment in the form of an additional section to the bill, which I shall read, to come in on page 33, after line 3, as section 37:

SEC. 37. That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to deprive the courts of jurisdiction over controversies arising or to arise between locators, claimants, lessees, or their assignees under the provisions of this act.

While it is my belief that the bill itself as proposed does not preclude the right of claimants to have their day in court, I think it proper to include in the bill a provision which will stand out so that no representative of the Government and no court may say to a man claiming his full and just rights that his rights have been barred by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. President, while it was not my intention to enter into any discussion of the merits of the bill, there are one or two points occurring to me which I think have been rather overlooked, or at least have not been brought to the attention of some Senators. It seems to me that a misapprehension exists as to the attitude of the people of the West and those in the public-land States regarding the disposition of the public domain. There is, perhaps, a strong feeling, at least in some other States, to the effect that the people of the West are trying to take advantage of the Government or to grab something for themselves to the exclusion of the citizens of other States, and in that way to take something which the citizens of other States have not the legal right to take. The facts are that residence has no effect in so far as asserting a claim on the public domain is concerned. It is the fact that the people of the western country are at all times not only glad but are anxious and willing to welcome the persons and the capital that come from the East, which are really needed for the full development of the latent resources of our western territory.

The rights under this bill would be granted to all citizens. Preferential rights are properly assigned to those who have done the prospecting, who have taken the greatest risks. As a matter of fact, those who went on the public domain and discovered oil at great expense and great risk, acting in all good faith, were entitled to receive title in fee simple to the land where discoveries had been made. They acted under the laws in force at the time they entered upon their projects; but withdrawal of the public lands has resulted in bringing into controversy quite a vast area in which oil was discovered, and this bill will have the effect of disposing of those controversies. Now, those people who in all good faith took the risk, expended their effort and their money, are going to be asked to accept and will have to accept leases under the terms of this bill, although they feel that they are entitled to title in fee simple.

In order to develop the western territory properly some inducements should be held out. We have been restricted to a great extent. Land in the public domain belonging to the Government is exempt from taxation, so that in some States from one-third to one-half of the territory is held up and the remaining portion bears the entire taxation, the entire expense of running the government of the State. I beg to submit that if any such condition were imposed upon any State in the eastern tier its residents would declare it as being impossible; they would not submit to any such situation.

While I am not in favor of the leasing plan—I think it is wrong in principle—it seems to me that at the present time it is perhaps the best that can be obtained for the development of the western section of the country and to bring onto the market for the use of our citizens the oil, the gas, the coal, the phosphates, and other commodities which are needed and are of commercial use. On all of these items the Government will receive quite as large a revenue as would any private owner in case he were leasing the property in question. The rates of royalty, it seems to me, are fair and reasonable, based upon actual commercial practice in the country contiguous. The same may be said as to the royalties on coal. I think they are fair and proper. Under the circumstances I feel, that being the best I can get, I am willing to support the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Colorado if it is not a fact—and I say this apropos of his statement respecting the prevailing view in the East that bills providing for the acquisition of public lands are only for the advantage of the West—that most of such lands which have been entered under the land laws of the United States have been entered by men who have gone there from the Eastern States and who have helped to build up the West? If the answer is affirmative, as it must be, then it is manifest that other parts of the country have been and will be in the future the beneficiaries of such laws. I am speaking now with respect to agricultural lands.

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say to the Senator from Utah that undoubtedly that is my view and belief.

Mr. KING. Is it not also true with respect to the mineral lands of the West that the major portion of the same are to-day owned by men who reside in the East; that while many of the producing mines have been discovered by western men or, at least, by men who have been in the West for a number of years, ultimately most of them passed into the hands of eastern individuals or corporations?

Mr. PHIPPS. I fully agree with the Senator in his statement in regard to that.

Mr. KING. So that the West, then, is owned in part by the East, and that whatever contributions are made in the shape of dividends and profits the East shares, perhaps, more than the West in such benefits.

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say to the Senator that in my opinion the full resources of the western section of our country will never be developed without the assistance of eastern capital and without an influx of people from the Eastern States to the public-land States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in relation to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, I doubt whether it is really necessary that it be put upon this bill; but I have no objection to it, and, so far as I may, I accept the amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in that connection I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who is now in the Chamber——

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator intend to refer to the amendment just offered by the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KING. I desire to call attention to the suggestion I am about to make, in order that I may ascertain whether or not the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado would cover the point I have in mind. I find on page 17, line 9, these words:

> No claimant for a lease who has been guilty of any fraud or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud, or who has not acted honestly and in good faith, shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section.

Suppose that some representative of the Interior Department, acting in an arbitrary way, without good and sufficient grounds, such as would warrant a judge who understood the law to determine that there was fraud, should insist that the applicant for a lease had been guilty of fraud, or, in the language of the bill, had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud, or insisted that the applicant had not acted "honestly and in good faith," and thereupon denied him a permit or any other benefits of this section, I ask the Senator having the bill in charge whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado would permit any inquiry before a competent judicial tribunal for the purpose of determining that question? I can easily conceive of an applicant seeking such permit being denied by some individual in the Interior Department the benefits of the bill. The Senator from Utah knows that unjustly and in an arbitrary way men have been denied leases upon forest reserves, and it has been held that there was no appeal. No tribunal having been created to which the matter could be referred, he was bound by the ipse dixit of some inferior official of the Government in some State. It seems to me that there ought to be some provision by which the applicant whose claim has been denied because it has been supposed that he did not act honestly or in good faith in some past transaction could have an opportunity to have that question tried out. He ought to have the right of appeal.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I call the attention of my colleague to a provision of the bill which takes care of the contingency of which the Senator has been speaking. The same penalty provision is attached to each one of the sections of the bill; and in section 30, page 29, it is provided:

> That any lease issued under the provisions of this act may be forfeited and canceled by an appropriate proceeding in the United States district court for the district in which the property, or some part therof, is located whenever the lessee fails to comply with any of the provisions of this act, of the lease, or of the general regulations promulgated under this act and in force at the date of the lease.

Mr KING. I call my colleague's attention to the fact that that seems to relate only to cases after the lease has been issued where it is claimed that the lessee has failed to observe some of the terms of the lease, and an action for forfeiture is then brought. The point to which I am directing attention relates to instances in which an individual is seeking a lease, but has not obtained a lease, and therefore no action of forfeiture could be brought. The language to which I call attention provides:

> No claimant for a lease who has been guilty of any fraud or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud, or who has not acted honestly and in good faith, shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section.

It would seem that there ought to be some right of appeal; there ought to be some judicial tribunal whose door would be open to his complaint when he felt that he had been unjustly dealt with.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator understands that the provision to which he is now referring is section 18, the release provision. It is a privilege that is conferred upon the applicant. He is at full liberty to pursue the present law and get a full title if he can; there is nothing in the proposed act that prevents that; but if he chooses to waive that, thinking that he can get better treatment through a lease, he is given this privilege, and, being given this privilege, we ought not to allow any man the right to go into court if the department has found that he is guilty of fraud.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, Mr. President, the same power would decide the question as to fraud in case he did relinquish that would decide if he did not relinquish, and, as the Senator from Wisconsin has so aptly stated, the provision cited by the Senator only applies to a person who voluntarily relinquishes whatever right he may have. He will not do that unless he thinks it is to his advantage, or, in other words, unless he prefers to take his lease and run the chance of a decision being rendered against him.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this bill has been so drawn as to discourage any individual from prosecuting to a successful issue his right to a patent. It is aimed to drive everybody who has a location upon the public domain into a relinquishment of his claim and to seek whatever benefits there may be under the provisions of this act.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the bill is not drawn with that in view.

Mr. KING. I am afraid it will have that result.

Mr. SMOOT. And if we adopt this new section—it seems to me, as I say, that it is unnecessary under the provisions of the bill—but if we do, it seems to me it is about as broad as it can be:

> That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to deprive the courts of jurisdiction over controversies arising or to arise between locators, claimants, lessees, or their assignees under the provisions of this act.

I think there is nothing in the act that would do it, but I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. KING. I am very glad the chairman of the committee is accepting that amendment. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado will be calculated to allay the fears of some who have just claims to the public domain and will tend to repress and to discourage arbitrary action on the part of officials of the Government.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I think there should be no misunderstanding upon the part of anyone. It certainly is not my understanding that the adoption of this amendment will give the courts jurisdiction to determine the right of any claimant to a lease from the Government. My understanding is that it only safeguards the existing rights that they may have as between themselves.

Mr. KING. Oh, I do not think anybody could place that construction upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I simply wanted to know if the amendment which the Senator from Utah suggested was accepted by the chairman?

Mr. KING. No; that is not broad enough to cover what I had in mind.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in view of what the Senator from Wisconsin has just said, I feel obliged to voice my dissent from that conclusion. I do not believe that the Secretary of the Interior or any other administrative officer should be clothed with the power of determining conclusively which of two contesting parties for a lease, based upon his possession of the premises in controversy, should receive it; and I construe the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Colorado to give a right to the courts, at the behest of any party claiming to have been injured, to review and reverse, if the facts justify it, such a conclusion as the Secretary of the Interior may reach.

For example, let us suppose that John Smith has made a location of an oil-mining claim—and I am not supposing an impossible case, by any means—and that he has been driven from the possession of it by some one claiming to have a superior right, and who, under circumstances of a favorable character, has held possession of that claim for an indefinite period, and therefore is entitled to be considered as having a prior right to demand a lease. The injured party makes an application for a lease as well, and these rival applications come before the Secretary of the Interior, who decides in favor of the party in possession. Can it be that the party whose lack of possession is due to no act of his own but to the presence of a vis major, which he is unable to overcome, shall have his rights determined by the ipse dixit, however well meant, of an administrative officer? That is not just; neither is it justice.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The reply to that, it seems to me, very clearly is that if here was a claimant who did not receive a lease but was entitled to the property, he could go on and perfect his title under the placer-mining law. He is not compelled to relinquish.

Mr. THOMAS. Ordinarily, Mr. President, that would be a conclusive answer; but a man owning a place located under the provisions of the placer law, however observant he may have been of all its requirements, can not in fact get a patent for his claim. That is a somewhat broad statement, but I do not recall the execution of any patents or amended patents for similar claims since this whole question of Government supervision of oil deposits has become an acute one. The right is there; the court is there; the facts are there; but unfortunately interferences, and notably by the Department of Justice, on behalf of the Government, are such that to say that such a man should be relegated to the courts is, under these circumstances, to deny him any practical and efficient remedy.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator surely does not contend, in reference to a locator who has complied with the law in all respects, that in order to receive the protection of the courts he must have a patent from the United States?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I do not; and yet if he has not a patent he is subjected to whatever the Department of Justice or the Department of the Interior, or both, may see fit to do in his case.

For example, there have been many cases of impounding the proceeds of oil—sometimes impounding the oil, but generally the proceeds—because of the institution of an action by the Department of Justice, notwithstanding the Department of the Interior has passed the claim to patent. Of course the most notorious instance of that situation is the case of the Honolulu Oil Co., whose locations were investigated exhaustively by the Interior Department, where the Secretary himself and the Commissioner of the Land Office devoted months to careful, searching, and patient inquiry into every fact and every phase of the situation, and who passed the claims for patent, only to be confronted by a suit brought on his own motion in the name of the United States by the Attorney General to set aside these locations for fraud, followed by the appointment of a receiver and by the impounding of the proceeds from these claims. That occurred, I think, if my recollection is not at fault, in 1916; and during the past three years such has been the situation.

As I stated on Saturday, there seems to be an irremovable conviction entertained by some of the authorities administering the laws that every claim and every claimant of oil lands that has been productive somewhere, somehow, has been guilty of disregarding the requirements of the law or otherwise defrauding or is about to defraud the United States; and it is the fact that the average locator can not secure title, and until he secures title he is subject to these constant interferences, that has made it necessary to come to some kind of an understanding or agreement under and by means of which the oil lands can be developed. I predict that if this bill passes in any fairly equitable shape, as I hope it will, the great bulk of locations bona fide made, and with a strict observance of all the requirements of the law, will be abandoned and applications for lease substituted in place thereof, not because the owners want to do it, but because they feel that they will be obliged to do it; and there is, to use a hackneyed phrase, a condition and not a theory confronting those people. That being the case, surely the decision of the very important question of who is entitled to a lease under this law should not be conclusive upon the defeated party if he desires to test the right judicially before the courts.

My attention was called specifically this morning by a telegram from one of the most eminent lawyers of the Colorado bar, Mr. Gerald Hughes, whose father was my honored predecessor in this body, to the probable effect upon the interests of some of his clients of lines 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24, on page 17, if adopted as reported by the committee:

> In case of conflicting claimants for leases under this section, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to grant leases to one or more of them, as shall be deemed just.

That is very plain.

> All leases hereunder shall inure to the benefit of the claimant and all persons claiming through or under him by lease, contract, or otherwise, as their interests may appear.

He calls my attention to the fact that some of his clients have been forcibly prevented from continuing their possession of ground properly located by them or by their predecessors in interest, and that they would be hopelessly injured if, through the exercise of the power which these clauses confer upon the Secretary, his decision should be final. I had prepared, and expected to offer later on, as an addition to that part of the section, an amendment providing that—

> The decision of the Secretary of the Interior and the granting of lease or leases thereunder shall not be conclusive of the rights of such conflicting claimant or claimants who have instituted or who may within 60 days after such decision institute an action at law or in equity in any court of competent jurisdiction for the adjudication thereof: Provided, That such action or actions shall be prosecuted with due diligence to final judgment or decree: And provided further, That any lease or leases granted hereunder shall inure to the benefit of the claimant or claimants prevailing in such litigation.

That seems to me to be so obviously desirable and so obviously just that no serious objection should be offered to it, unless it be that the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. PHIPPS], and accepted by the chairman, is sufficiently broad to cover that class of cases.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that if the amendment he now suggests were adopted following the word "just," on line 21, page 17, it seems to me it would open the door to every blackmailer that there is in all that western country. I have discussed this question many times with the Wyoming oil men. The independent oil producers have called my attention to the fact that if a provision of that kind were adopted the whole field in Wyoming would be tied up, and there would be no telling when there would be an adjustment made of it; and they tell me that there are a number of blackmailers out there who have no more right to claims upon those lands than I have, with the exception of the fact that years ago they went upon them, and then abandoned them entirely; and they would come in under a provision of that kind, and the Secretary of the Interior never would know when he was safe in leasing. I think myself that this section ought to cover every conceivable case. If a claimant has any rights in court, it certainly will cover them.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think what the Senator says is largely true, but it is equally true of every law that we have passed heretofore regarding the public domain; it will be true of this law whether it contains this amendment or not, and it will be true of every law designed to protect the right of bona fide citizens and made sufficiently broad for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that is the reason why I was perfectly willing to accept the amendment offered by the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. They may be broad enough, but unfortunately the blackmailer can not be suppressed by a preamble or by a statute. He is there, and he will take advantage of, as well as create, any opportunity and every opportunity possible to enable him to ply his infamous trade. I want to suppress him as much as possible. In fact, the existence of that species of individual on two legs is at the basis of all of the controversy which this bill designs to settle. If the scoundrel and the blackmailer had been less active, the honest men who have suffered from the consequences of his activities would long ago have had their patents, and would have proceeded with the development of the public domain. Now, of course, I do not want to encourage that sort of thing. My face has been set against it at all times. I had a somewhat active career at the bar in the State from which I hail, and I realize that in all such subjects as involve the possibility of securing title or clouding the title to deposits of unusual value, like gold, silver, copper, oil, and so forth, it is an opportunity which has never yet been lost sight of or overlooked by the unscrupulous and the adventurer. I am not able myself to agree that the amendment of my colleague is sufficiently broad for all cases. It may be, but surely it will under no circumstances prove to be an injury or any greater injury than that outlined in the amendment to which reference has been made. I will offer it at the proper moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I will read. I have hastily prepared it. At the close of line 12, page 17, I move to add:

> If a lease is denied to any such claimant upon the ground that he has been guilty of fraud or had knowledge or reasonable ground to know of any fraud, or has not acted honestly and in good faith, he shall have a right of action in any court of competent jurisdiction against the Secretary of the Interior to determine such question.

I have followed the language of the bill in the use of the words "fraud," "reasonable ground to know of any fraud," and so forth.

I can only say in support of the amendment I think there ought to be some appeal from the action of the Secretary of the Interior where he denies to the claimant who seeks a lease his application for the same. I have no doubt if the Secretary of the Interior or his assistant, some lawyer of ability in the department, had time and opportunity, as a judge has the time and the opportunity, to hear both sides of the case and hear all the facts and examine the law, his decision would be as satisfactory as the decision of the ordinary judge; but we know that such is not the case. It is felt by many who have had business with the Department of the Interior, particularly with the subordinates who for the time represented the department, that there has not always been that full, fair, candid, and dispassionate examination of questions of fact and questions of law that ought to characterize proceedings involving the title to property of great value.

It does seem to me that if a claimant is willing to abandon whatever point of vantage he may have by reason of his location and seek to come in under the provisions of this act he ought not to be denied the right to appeal from the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, if the Secretary, perhaps upon some ex parte hearing, finds that there has been fraud or that the claimant has had reasonable ground to know of any fraud, not his own fraud, the fraud of some one else, and who has not acted honestly and in good faith. Those words, of course, imply so much, they permit such a wide discretion upon the part of an individual who is not exercising a judicial function, that there ought to be a right of review of his finding and decision.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] a moment ago suggested that any person claiming a right to the public domain who was willing to relinquish such right and seek to take advantage of the provisions of this act ought to be satisfied with the decision of the Secretary of the Interior and should be absolutely content to make the latter the final court. With due respect for the views of my friend, I submit that if the claimant should have that right in other instances it ought not to be denied him because he is seeking to take advantage of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator knows, does he not, that he would not have that right in pressing the very claim that he relinquishes to patent, and why should he have a greater right in this kind of case than if he pressed his location to patent?

Mr. KING. This bill is an innovation. It has for its object the settlement of a long-standing controversy and the riveting upon the country of a policy which, as I have suggested, is not only a departure from prevailing law, but, in my opinion, is a very unfortunate one. It would seem that where we are inaugurating a system so utterly at variance with the policies of the past, there ought not to be any opposition to the granting of the right of review by a suitable tribunal of the important legal question which is involved, because the question of fraud, while it may in some instances be a question of fact and in some a question of law, and is frequently a mixed question of law and fact, is of such a character that it should be determined by a judicial tribunal.

I do insist, Mr. President, that it would be in the interest of fairness to permit the right of appeal and the right of review where the Secretary of the Interior may have passed upon the question of fraud or the question of good faith or the question of knowledge of the commission of a fraud by some third person. I can not conceive of any reasonable grounds for opposing that proposition. The Senator certainly does not think the courts are going to act unfairly. He has confidence in the courts of our land, and I think that a claimant ought to have the right to invoke the powers of a judicial tribunal here as in the instances that were suggested by the Senator from Colorado.

The Interior Department is an executive one. It is in a sense a political subdivision of the Government. So far as possible questions involving property or personal rights should be referred to judicial tribunals for settlement. That is in harmony with Anglo-Saxon institutions. We have the three tripartite divisions of governmental powers, and the line of separation between them should be maintained. But there has been much criticism of the plan under which the Interior Department was given such arbitrary and untrammeled power to deal with the controversies between the Government and individuals growing out of the efforts of the latter to obtain title to public lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say just a word. This case refers to persons who upon their own initiative relinquish to the Government interest in claims that they may have. It does seem to me that a person relinquishing a claim, no matter in what position that claim be at the time he undertakes to relinquish it, never should have and should not be given any more right under this provision than he has to carry his claims to patent. It seems to me that it is wholly unnecessary to make the penalty stronger than it is now in the bill as it is before the Senate.

Mr. KING. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I wish to say to my colleague that I think the existing law which denies the right to the claimant to have the decision of the Interior Department reviewed is wrong, and I have introduced a bill to take away from the Interior Department the power to pass upon the question of the right of an individual to patent. I think it is a judicial question, and the Secretary of the Interior ought not to be permitted to decide upon whether or not the law has been complied with. There are courts of the United States, as well as of the States, in the public-land States. The claimants for patents, and under this bill those who seek leases, either live in such States or will be engaged in their activities for the development of the demised premises within such States. The questions arising in obtaining titles or leases are such as naturally come before judicial tribunals. The American citizen has confidence in the courts; he wants an opportunity in open court to meet his opponent and to present his side of the case. In other words, he wants "his day in court."

Mr. SMOOT. There is something in the statement my colleague has just made, and some justice in it, too, but his suggestion would involve the question of procedure of homesteading of lands or a mine location for the future, and such an amendment to the law would affect each individual locator. The penalty provision under discussion affects lands that have already been entered under the laws as they exist to-day. There is nothing in section 18 to compel a locator or a claimant of any kind to relinquish anything. He need not change the position that he occupies to-day. If he would prefer to go on and prosecute his claim to title, he will not be affected by the passage of section 18.

As far as section 18 of the bill is concerned, it seems to me that the penalty should stand just as it is, and I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. Suppose one or two competing claimants agreed to relinquish, and the other determined not to relinquish and to prosecute his claim to patent if possible. What would be the status of the property in controversy under the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Before any lease is granted under the provisions of section 18 it will have to be shown that there is no fraud——

Mr. THOMAS. That there is a complete relinquishment?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; there is a complete relinquishment.

Mr. THOMAS. That was my understanding. I merely wanted to emphasize it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I hope no friend of the bill will vote for this amendment, because it is my judgment that its adoption would prove a very serious obstruction to any legislation upon this subject. I can well understand that my friend from Utah being opposed to the bill in toto, of course it would not be a matter of great importance to him.

Mr. KING. Will my friend permit me?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. If I were in favor of the bill and the principle upon which it rests, I could not consistently find, it seems to me, an argument against the amendment which I have offered. I can not conceive of any impropriety in permitting controversies to be settled by a judicial tribunal. Indeed, it seems to me that is the purpose of courts, and that we would be furthering the interests of justice if we provided by legislation a method to enable contesting claimants to settle their controversies in the courts.

Mr. LENROOT. But the Senator forgets that this entire section is a section extending a privilege to a certain class of claimants. The Senator well knows that it is this section that has caused the greatest controversy of any portion of the oil-leasing legislation. Complaint has constantly been made that legislation which has been proposed in the past has opened the door of relief to fraudulent claimants. This is the strongest provision against fraud that has ever been found in any relief section in an oil-leasing bill.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that it would conduce to fraud to attach to the bill a provision that the controversy should be tried in a court of competent jurisdiction? And that would mean, of course, either a Federal court or a State court of standing and ability.

Mr. LENROOT. That is just what I was coming to. We extend the privilege to claimants here that they may exercise the option of relinquishment or not. There is no compulsion about it. They may proceed under the existing placer-mining law either to a patent, or without patent, if they have fully complied with the law, hold their claims against the world.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Utah, whether or not if we stop now and relegate this to the courts it would open the door for certain things, I wish to say that it would in my judgment open the widest possible field for anyone who wished to go into court and allege that he had not done this or had not done that, and, instead of getting title, it would be postponed in an overcrowded court for years and years before the title would ever be consummated.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true. Regarding this as a privilege, as it is, all that this section does is that the United States in extending this privilege says the United States will not accept as a lessee of the property anyone whom the agent of the United States finds has been guilty of fraud. The Senator would have in addition to that the Government go to the expense of proving fraud in a court of competent jurisdiction in a case where the Government only is determining who its lessee shall be. It is not depriving a claimant of any right because that claimant is not called upon to make a relinquishment of a lease at all.

As has been suggested by the Senator from New Mexico, if the Senator's amendment be adopted they can throw all these cases into court, with the object, perhaps upon the part of the Standard Oil Co. or some other great corporation, of finally getting a chance at the leases under other provisions of the law. You will possibly have thrown all these cases into the courts either for that reason or for the purpose of blackmail upon the part of some one who has been charging fraud where none exists.

As to competency to determine that question as between the Secretary of the Interior and the courts, I maintain that the Interior Department is much more competent to determine questions of fraud than is the court. In every case that will come within the provisions of this act the agents of the Department of the Interior will have the fullest reports. The Secretary of the Interior himself, who can not be presumed to acquaint himself with all the facts in the multitude of cases, I dare say knows the facts in practically every case that comes within the provisions of section 18, because they have been before the Interior Department for nearly 10 years now. It would be the greatest mistake to throw this matter into the courts. We can rely upon the Secretary of the Interior to be fair to the claimants, and whenever the Secretary of the Interior says that upon all the facts before him a man has been guilty of fraud, that ought to be a sufficient determination, and the United States should not grant a lease to such a claimant.

There is another reason for that, because if a man has been guilty of fraud, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, prior to securing the lease, he would be very apt to be guilty of fraud upon the Government if he had the opportunity after he got the lease, and the Government ought to have the freest opportunity to reject any claimant for a lease who in the opinion of its agents has been guilty of fraud.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would not make any further observations except for one remark of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Frequently upon the floor of the Senate a bogy man is referred to. In the discussion of this bill the bogy man is the Standard Oil Co. The Senator from Wisconsin has just intimated that a process in authorizing a trial by competent courts would be in the interest of the Standard Oil Co. Of course, the Senator from Wisconsin does not mean to impute to the courts of the land, either State or Federal, any improper conduct or that they are controlled in any manner by the Standard Oil corporation or by any other corporation. I think the Senator from Wisconsin will join with other lawyers who are familiar with our courts in according to them the highest praise because of their ability and integrity as judges. The high character of our judges, the strong sense of justice which has characterized their judicial conduct, their high moral standards, and universally recognized incorruptibility have earned for them the confidence and, indeed, affection of the American people.

It is therefore a mistake to commit to executive departments or political agencies the determination of questions that are essentially judicial in character.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, I fully concur in all the Senator from Utah has said, but the Senator knows quite as well as does the Senator from Wisconsin that one of the favorite methods of large, rich corporations to procure control of properties of lesser individuals is to subject them to vexatious litigation and compel them to sell out to them.

Mr. KING. I do not think that I can assent to the Senator's statements, except with qualifications. I have known of vexatious suits being brought by individuals who were without financial resources against corporations and against other individuals, though the defendants were possessed of considerable means. I am inclined to think that the honors would be about as easy in the class of cases which the Senator has in mind and those to which I have alluded. The Senator knows, however, that a majority of the oil claims in this country are not owned by the Standard Oil Co. I do not think the Standard Oil Co. has been interested to any great extent of late years in making oil locations in the United States or in acquiring them until they became producing properties. The Standard Oil Co. prefers not to take the gamble; it waits until the poor individual, or the individual who can secure sufficient funds from his friends and neighbors and associates to procure a mining property, sinks a well and discovers oil.

The Standard Oil Co. and other refining corporations in later years have waited until the oil was discovered. Then they negotiate for its purchase, construct pipe lines, and convey the oil to their refining establishments.

My information is that the Standard Oil Co. has spent but little in the last 15 or 20 years in trying to find oil in the United States. I know that in the State of Utah, where hundreds and thousands of attempts have been made to find oil, and thousands and tens of thousands, and perhaps millions, of dollars have been spent in efforts to discover oil, the Standard Oil Co. has not engaged in the futile and losing game.

Mr. LENROOT rose.

Mr. KING. So the facts are that the overwhelming majority of the oil claims upon the public domain which will come within the provisions of this proposed measure are owned by private individuals or by small corporations that have been organized by men of limited means. Therefore I submit, with all due respect to the Senator, that this amendment, which gives a man a day in court if the Secretary of the Interior finds against him and denies his right to a lease, is not in the interest of the Standard Oil Co., but is in the interest of the poor men who have gone out upon the public domain and made locations and are now claimants, and who would be the applicants for leases under the provisions of this proposed act. How could the interest of the Standard Oil Co. be served by permitting tribunals entitled to settle disputes to hear the evidence and decide the questions at issue?

Mr. LENROOT. Much of what the Senator says is true, but it is also true that the Standard Oil Co. to-day is a large producer as well as refiner of oil. I do not know that the Senator from Utah is aware that on Naval Reserve No. 1, in California, only a year ago, I think, or not more than two years ago, the Secretary of the Navy reported that his experts had determined there were not over, I believe, 30,000,000 barrels of oil——

Mr. SMOOT. That was 18 months ago.

Mr. LENROOT. Eighteen months ago. The Geological Survey, I think, finally made an estimate of there being something like a hundred million barrels, but the Standard Oil Co. within the last six months has developed its private property on Naval Reserve No. 1, and from the production that it has secured it is now practically certain that there are more than 200,000,000 barrels of oil on that reserve. So the Standard Oil Co. is itself a producer as well as a refiner of oil.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to submit to my esteemed friend, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], that it occurs to me that he is straining at a gnat while he is compelled to swallow a camel. The Secretary of the Interior passes upon the question of good faith or fraud or the absence of fraud in every application for a patent.

Mr. KING. I concede that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In the case of every homesteader who presents an application the question of whether or not he has committed a fraud comes up, and the Secretary of the Interior passes upon it. The homesteader has no appeal to any court to determine whether he has or has not committed a fraud. Every mineral claimant, as the Senator well knows, is exactly in the same situation; every man who endeavors to get title to a piece of land by virtue of a location is in exactly the same situation. In every case where the Secretary of the Interior is called to pass upon the matter of good faith, particularly upon the question of whether the applicant has or has not been guilty of fraud, no appeal to any court is allowed in the premises at all. Now, why should we single out this particular case, where an option is given to land that is located as an oil claim, either to go on and get patent under the statute if the claimant can do so, in which case he will have to exonerate himself of any fraud, or take a lease under this bill, in which case the provisions of the bill apply?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has made no valuable contribution to this discussion by his remarks. The points suggested have already been adverted to by Senators and discussed, though, perhaps, when the Senator was out of the Chamber. I have said in reply to a similar suggestion made by one of the Senators that the existing law commits to the Secretary of the Interior the power to decide controversies between claimants for public land and the Government; but I aver that the system is unsatisfactory and is inconsistent with our theory of government. There have been complaints in the past, and there are complaints now, that the method of disposing of the mineral and agricultural lands is improper, and that there ought to be some judicial tribunal to which cases may be referred after they have been adjudicated or passed upon by the Secretary of the Interior. Indeed many insist that the entire matter of securing patent should be taken out of the jurisdiction of the Interior Department. It is believed that the courts should decide who are entitled to patents, whether the law has been complied with under which an applicant for a patent proceeds, as well as all controversies between individuals relating to their respective claims for patent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah knows very well—and I simply speak of it to recall it to his attention—that there has been pending before Congress, lo, these many years, a bill giving a right of appeal to the courts from decisions of the Secretary of the Interior in relation to all of these matters. It occurs to me that the argument of the Senator is rather in favor of that bill. I submit to him that there does not seem to be any just reason why we should make a distinction here. It seems to me the argument is all in favor of the bill giving the general right of appeal.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is very much in what my distinguished friend from Montana has said; and I admit that the system which has grown up has become so crystallized, so buttressed, that I do not know whether there are forces sufficient in the United States to demolish it. I had the honor to introduce a bill here some time ago for the purpose of taking away from the Interior Department the right to pass upon the questions involved in the issuance of a patent. I submitted a copy of the measure to my distinguished friend from Montana, for whose opinion I have a very high regard, and I sincerely hope it will commend itself to his good judgment, and that he will join with me, or that I may aid him, in breaking down a system which I regard as anachronistic and incongruous with our institutions and that a better and more rational and enlightened one may be established.

Now, if I could get this amendment adopted as a part of this bill, it would be an entering wedge in the work of demolition of the structure which I conceive to be unfair and unsound. I shall be very glad if I do not swallow the camel referred to by the Senator, but hope to get the camel's head into the building, and I hope very soon after that shall have been effectuated that I shall get the camel's entire body into the tent; that we will see the body of the camel safely protected within the structure.

Mr. ASHURST. Hump and all.

Mr. KING. As the Senator from Arizona has said, hump and all.

Mr. President, in conclusion permit me to say that I can not see any reason why the right of appeal to a court should be denied. The courts are the bulwarks of this country. The judges of our courts for more than 100 years have performed their important duties with fidelity and with a scrupulous regard for their oaths. I do not know of any officials of the land who have universally stood so high in the affections of the people as have the judges of our land. I think that to give them the right of review in this instance would be a very wise provision, and particularly in view of the fact, as was suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], that there doubtless will be many instances in which there will be not one but several claimants for leases for the same parcel of land. Obviously the Secretary of the Interior ought not to have the exclusive and sole right to determine that question. If there are two or three claimants to a mineral-lode claim or a placer claim, they go into court and the court determines who is the locator, who is entitled to patent, who is entitled to the right of possession. As has been stated, there will perhaps be in many cases two or more claimants for the mineral lands included within the provisions of this bill. As the bill is drawn they will have no right of appeal from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think that it would be practicable at all to repose in a court the determination of which of the rival claimants should have the lease. Of course, in the case of mineral claims the rights are fixed by the facts, and all the courts can determine is the question of what the facts are and then apply the law to those facts. The one who first locates the ground is entitled to the ground, assuming that its location is a valid one and he has subsequently preserved his right by appropriate proceedings. Those facts will be determined by the courts, but in this case there are a half a dozen applicants for a lease of the property. None of them have any right whatever to it except they get it by the lease; it is a matter of making a choice between a half a dozen different claimants, none of whom can assert any right to a lease at all. I do not see how the Senator could submit that question to a court.

Mr. KING. If the Senator is right, then I am in error, but I think the Senator is wrong. My understanding is that the amendment which I have tendered relates to an entirely different case. It relates to those who are seeking leases, who already have claims to the land, and who relinquish their claims and seek to obtain leases rather than to rely upon location and apply for patent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I appreciate that their conflicting rights would have to be determined, but it seems to me that that is taken care of by the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator refer to the amendment of the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS]?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. To that of the junior Senator from Colorado.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I understood from the chairman of the committee as well as from the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that each of them denies that the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Colorado would reach the case to which the Senator now refers.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think that the matter now suggested by the junior Senator from Utah was called to the attention of the chairman of the committee. Assume the case of two or three individuals, each asserting priority of right to a certain placer mining location, or assume the case of one contending that he has it by virtue of a homestead location. Of course, if it is mineral ground, he would be eliminated, but assume that he goes on and contends that it is not mineral but is agricultural ground. The rights of the rival placer mining locators would be determined by the usual proceedings in an appropriate court. A would assert his right against B. Their respective rights would be determined, and the one who prevailed in the case—and his right is preserved by the amendment of the Senator from Colorado—would then go to the Secretary of the Interior, claim the benefit of this particular provision, and ask for a preference lease, or if he came there and the other claimant came also, the Secretary would say, "There is a dispute about this; I do not know that you are the person to whom I ought to issue a lease."

Then he would direct the two claimants to go into the appropriate court and settle the question as to which one of them was entitled to the property as against the other, and the one who prevailed would establish his right to a lease under the provisions of this section.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana will recall that the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] stated that that aspect of the case had received consideration at the hands of the committee, that they concluded that blackmailers might bring suits and tie the matter up for an indefinite period, and therefore the committee drew the bill—at least, I so understood him—so as to deny the right to appeal to the court.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If they attempted to do that, let me say to the Senator from Utah, who is good enough a lawyer to recognize it at once, they have not accomplished it at all. Here is A, who has a placer location upon certain ground and claims it; B, a perfect specimen of blackmailer, asserts that he has a placer mining location, and starts a suit against A to establish his right. The Senator does not see any reason why he can not start such a suit, does he?

Mr. KING. Certainly not; but the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], as I understood the colloquy, suggested the case to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], of two or more claimants seeking a lease from the Government, and he called attention to a telegram which he had received from a leading lawyer of the State of Colorado expressing the view that the provision on page 17 denied the right to go into court and left it exclusively to the Secretary of the Interior to award the lease to one or the other of the claimants. I have expressed no opinion in regard to that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am perfectly certain that any apprehensions on that ground are utterly unfounded, because the locator of a placer mining claim has the privilege of going into court in the State of Colorado and establishing his right; but if an application under this provision of the proposed statute were made to the Secretary, and another claimant came and asserted to the Secretary, "I have a suit pending against this man in the courts of Colorado, and I ask you to defer his application until the result of that suit shall be determined," unless his bad faith were clearly disclosed I can not entertain a doubt that the Secretary would withhold the lease, particularly so because if he should prevail in the suit it would appear that the man who had lost the case never had any foundation for it, and his lease would eventually be canceled.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to what my colleague stated, I will say that my position was that the amendment of the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] did not take away from or add to the rights of any claimant who desired to relinquish his claim under the provisions of the bill and take a lease under that provision, and I do not think it does. In fact, Mr. President, I do not think the amendment, as I stated before, is necessary under the provisions of this bill. I think it is taken care of, and I so stated in accepting the amendment. I further stated—and I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] did—that there was no reason why a claimant should have any more rights under section 18 of the bill, or any more rights granted to him, than he has to-day. He need not relinquish his claim to the Government. He can go on and perfect his claim, and I have not any doubt but that if he thinks he can get a title, and his rights are perfect, that is what he will do; but if there is a question in his mind as to whether he is going to get a patent in the end, I have not any doubt but that he will relinquish all of his rights and take a lease under section 18 of this bill.

Mr. KING. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I do not want to misapprehend his position or the position of the Senator from Wisconsin, but I understood each of the Senators to take the position that under the provisions found on page 17 of the bill the right to appeal to the court from the decision of the Secretary of the Interior denying to one claimant as against another his right to a lease was not permitted; in other words, that his decision was final; so that if there were two or more claimants to a piece of land, and they concluded for any reason that they would not go into the court, but they would go to the Secretary of the Interior for the purpose of applying for a lease, his decision as to the one that was entitled to the lease would be final.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I tried to make my position clear upon the matter; and the distinction between the amendment that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] proposed and the situation that the Senator from Montana suggests is just this: In the case of the situation the Senator from Montana suggests, the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], if it was necessary at all, takes care of it; but the amendment suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] proposed that if there were conflicting claims before the Secretary the Secretary could take no action until they were all adjudicated by the courts, if I correctly understood him.

Mr. THOMAS. No; not quite that.

Mr. LENROOT. I may not have understood the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. That it would not be conclusive and would not interfere with the right to appeal from the decision of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LENROOT. That amounted to the same thing; and that was what I, for one, said would open the door to the widest kind of blackmail and permit all sorts of fake claims to be made for the purpose of holding up the honest claimant. In the case under existing law that would not be true. There would have to be some color of title at least before the courts would entertain a suit; and the Secretary of the Interior, under the matter as it now stands in the bill, if he was satisfied that there was not a shadow of a claim, that it was simply a holdup, would be permitted to ignore it and grant a lease.

Mr. SMOOT. I think my colleague misconstrues the position taken by the Senator from Wisconsin and myself upon a statement that was made by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. He was talking upon the amendment that was offered by my colleague and referred to the amendment that was offered by the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], and what he said in that particular, if I understood him correctly, of course was not my position. My position is exactly the same as that of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not rise for the purpose of discussing the effect of the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] or the necessity of the amendment which was just suggested by the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I was addressing myself solely to the amendment which I had tendered, and I stated in presenting that matter that perhaps an additional reason why my amendment should be adopted arose from the fact the the junior Senator from Wisconsin had stated in substance, as I understood him, that no right of appeal would lie from the Secretary of the Interior where a number of claimants applied for a lease and he decided in favor of one as against the others.

Mr. President, I have submitted all that I care to say in respect to this amendment. I can only repeat that, notwithstanding the provision of existing law denies the right of appeal from the decision of the Secretary of the Interior upon application for patent, agricultural or mineral, I think the time has come when the right of appeal should be granted; and I believe that in a case of this character, where, as I suggested a moment ago, we are establishing a new system, there ought to be an opportunity for claimants who have been denied by the Secretary of the Interior the right to lease upon the alleged ground that they have been guilty of fraud or have not acted honestly or in good faith, to have that question tried out in the courts of the land. I know that it would be far more satisfactory to the people of the West and to all who have to deal with public-land questions. Though they have the utmost confidence in the personnel of those in the Interior Department, and particularly in the present Secretary of the Interior, nevertheless they would prefer to have the opportunity of determining questions of this character in the courts of the land.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and which I will submit without further discussion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, after line 24, it is proposed to insert:

The decision of the Secretary of the Interior and the granting of lease or leases thereunder shall not be conclusive of the rights of such conflicting claimant or claimants who have instituted or who may within 60 days after such decision institute an action at law or in equity in any court of competent jurisdiction for the adjudication thereof: Provided, That such action or actions shall be prosecuted with due diligence to final judgment or decree: And provided further, That any lease or leases granted hereunder shall inure to the benefit of the claimant or claimants prevailing in such litigation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that I doubt the wisdom of accepting this amendment to this bill, and I hope it will not be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment which I proposed to the pending bill on August 22 be read and laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, it is proposed to strike out all after the words "United States," on line 4, and the word "receipts," being the first word on line 5, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

To meet the expenses which may be incurred in the prosecution of such investigations by the Bureau of Mines as have been or may from time to time be authorized or ordered by Congress, and the amounts so paid into the Treasury are hereby appropriated for such purposes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move the adoption of the proposed amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, while I am in sympathy with the object of the amendment, I think this is a very inappropriate time and not the proper place to bring it about. I will join with the Senator from Nevada in securing a direct appropriation for this purpose, and I will say to the Senator that I have not any doubt, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, that there will be an appropriation made for this very purpose. In the past, however, it has always been held that these moneys, or at least a part of them, should go into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of miscellaneous receipts in order that the actual expense to the Government for the administration of this law should be met out of the royalties paid, and this bill provides that 10 per cent of all the royalties shall go to that credit. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not be agreed to. I say again that I will join the Senator in getting a direct appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I am prepared at this time to make a few brief comments on the work of the Bureau of Mines in regard to these experimentations. In view of what the Senator from Utah said the other day as to the scarcity of oil and the likelihood of a shortage within the probably not far-distant future, I had in mind the development of these extensive oil-shale fields in the West, from which I am sure in time we can secure a large amount of oil. However, in view of what the Senator from Utah has just told me—that he has in mind some appropriations for the purpose of carrying on such experimentations—I shall refrain at this time from commenting on that work, and will withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Nevada is withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I rise to inquire of the chairman of the committee if I understand him aright as saying that no practical results have yet been secured from the experimentations for the purpose of devising an economical method of extracting oil from oil shale?

Mr. SMOOT. There was so much confusion in the Chamber that I did not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator made some remarks the other day about the results of the experimentations for the purpose of extracting oil economically from oil shale. Did the Senator say that up to the present time it had not been shown to be economically practicable?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I made that statement—that up to the present time there had been no system adopted by which oil could be profitably extracted from the American oil shale.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The oil shales are an enormous reservoir of oil, are they not?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, undoubtedly; and I stated to the Senate that in my opinion it would not be many years until a system would be discovered that would successfully extract the oil, and I look for a great production of oil to come from the great shale beds within the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I want to ask the chairman his view regarding the provision of the bill about prospectors going on Indian reservations.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there is a law already upon the statute books that authorizes them to go upon Indian reservations and prospect for minerals of all kinds, and, of course, that includes oil.

Mr. LENROOT. Is that not just metalliferous mining?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon; that only refers to metalliferous mining.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. That does not apply to this bill, then?

Mr. SMOOT. That does not apply to this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Then the provision in the bill including national parks and military reservations is confusing.

Now, I should like to ask the chairman another question with regard to page 5, line 11, where it provides for a rental per acre for the land, and it reads, after specifying the amount per acre:

Except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Suppose there were not any royalties?

Mr. SMOOT. Then they would pay their 25 cents for the first year and 50 cents for the second and third and fourth years, respectively. I will say that the reason for that is that the Government ought to have some kind of payment, small as it is, to insure the Government that work will proceed; and we thought that this was the very least amount that the Government could ask by way of a payment per acre upon the lands when a person had a permit to prospect. But after they discover the oil, then, of course, they pay this; and every time they pay the 25 cents or the 50 cents or the $1, as the case may be, it is credited upon the royalties they pay.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I understand that well; but suppose there are no royalties, where does this rent go? It says "shall." It does not use the word "may," but it says it shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for the year.

Mr. SMOOT. It goes to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Naturally that would be the only place where it could go; but the question that occurred to me was whether they would be obliged to pay any rent for the surface of the land if there was no royalty under that provision?

Mr. LENROOT. It simply means if there were royalties for the year, the royalties to be paid to the Government are reduced by the amount of the rent paid to the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Then would it not be better to use the word "may" instead of "shall"?

Mr. SMOOT. No; because if there are no royalties we want them to pay something, and it provides that they "shall" pay it.

Mr. LENROOT. If there are royalties equal to the rent, we do not want them to pay any rent.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. It says "they shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year."

Mr. SMOOT. If there was no payment to be made and it was not compulsory a man could take out a permit here and then simply do nothing at all until the end of the term of the permit and hold up the development of the land for that length of time. But we want to see to it that while he has the land and the permit upon it, and no one else can receive a permit while he has it, he shall pay this rental. If he discovers oil and there is any royalty, then we say all we want of you is the royalty, and this rental that has been paid we will credit on the royalty.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. With that explanation it looks all right, so far as it relates to my question.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what particular reason actuated the committee in placing in the bill the provision with respect to the rent for each year being credited against royalty. The royalty is a comparatively small amount and the rental also is a comparatively small amount. Without any further information in respect to the matter I fail to understand why the lessee should receive credit for the rental of land as against the royalty.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought I had made that plain. I was unfortunate perhaps in the way I presented it.

Mr. NUGENT. I did not hear all that the Senator said with reference to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Your committee thought, and every bill that has been drawn from the first that was drawn affecting leasing the public domain for the purposes enumerated in the bill has provided, that wherever a citizen of the United States received a prospecting permit he should pay to the Government for the first year 25 cents per acre, and for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years 50 cents per acre. That is for the purpose of at least having him pay for the privilege of receiving the prospecting permit; but if in that time he discovers oil and in any one year produces oil, then we simply say you shall still pay this rental, and if you have paid the rental it shall be credited upon the oil produced in that year.

Mr. NUGENT. I notice that the same provision is contained in the section of the bill with respect to coal.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NUGENT. Do I understand that this provision is operative only with respect to permits, or does it extend during the entire period of the lease?

Mr. SMOOT. It extends during the period of the lease. I think $1 is the maximum. Suppose in the fifth year, when the $1 per acre rate goes into effect, the royalties do not amount to as much as the rent. The rent will be collected to the full amount. In other words, if the rent was $2,560 at $1 an acre on the full acreage to which a lease could be made, and the royalties only amounted to $2,000 from the lease, whether it be a coal mine or a phosphate mine or any other mine provided for in the bill, the lessee would be compelled to pay on the lease $1 per acre; but if the royalties are more than $2,560, then he is credited with the amount of the rent that he has paid upon it. In other words, the privilege that was granted to him at least must be worth at the end of five years $1 an acre.

Mr. NUGENT. Then, as I understand it, if the lessee holds a tract of land containing 2,560 acres the rental of which is $1 per acre, amounting to $2,560 per year, and the amount of the royalty for that year amounts to $2,600, he is credited on the royalty for the entire amount of the rental, which would leave $40 as the amount coming to the Government for that year?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and I will say to the Senator there is this reason for it. Suppose they have a lease upon a coal mine and some unforeseen accident happens, an accident from the elements or perhaps from other causes which would prevent the lessee from operating the mine at a profit, or that upon request of the Secretary of the Interior, if we should grant the right under the bill here, that it should not be operated because of the fact that it could only be operated at a loss, in that case the royalties of course may not amount to $1 an acre, but under the provision as long as he holds the lease he must pay at least $1 an acre.

Mr. NUGENT. The instance which the Senator relates, I think he will agree with me, is one that will very seldom occur. I fail to see any particular reason why the lessee of one of these tracts who has made a very considerable sum of money out of it during the year should not be obliged to pay at least something to the Government. In other words, in the case I put just a moment ago, if his royalties amount to $2,600 and the rent to $2,560, then the Government receives but $40.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. LENROOT. It receives the highest sum.

Mr. NUGENT. That is what I asked the Senator from Utah. I may have misunderstood his answer. But if the rental amounts to $2,560 at $1 per acre per year on 2,560 acres, and the amount of royalty under one of these leases would be $2,600, then, if the rental is credited against the royalty, the Government would receive but $40.

Mr. SMOOT. The Government had already received a rental of $2,560. In other words, the bill provides that the very highest amount, whether it is from the rental or whether it is from the lease, the Government shall receive, and the lessee will be compelled to pay it.

Mr. NUGENT. What I am trying to get at is whether the Government receives the money derived from rentals as well as the money derived from the royalties.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, but it is credited in this way. Of course, if the royalties amount to more than $1 an acre, then it is credited upon the rental. The amount that is the greatest of the two the Government receives.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In any case, as the Senator says, the Government would receive $2,600. It would receive $2,560 rental, and it would receive $40 more. The royalties amount to so much more than the rental.

Mr. NUGENT. I understand that is what the Senator contends, but is that all the Government receives?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the royalty would figure out $2,600, the Government would receive the whole $2,600. That is all it would receive. If the royalty figured out only $2,200, the Government would receive not only that $2,200 but it would receive also the difference between that and $2,560, or $360 more. The Government would receive $2,560, although the royalties amount to only $2,200.

Let me say to the Senator that in drafting the bill the idea that was in mind was to proceed upon the royalty basis. The plan was to leave these properties upon a royalty basis, but it was figured out that a man might take a lease on 2,560 acres, and he would work only, we will say, 40 acres, and he would let the remainder lie idle if he paid a royalty only upon his output. Suppose, for instance, the 40 acres were producing oil, and he did not operate the other part of the land, and it kept everybody else from operating it, the purpose was to put a penalty upon him so as to compel him not to take any more land than he really expected to operate, and if he did take any more to make him pay a rental for it if his royalties did not amount to as much as the rental.

Mr. NUGENT. Does the Senator think that the object could be effected, in view of the fact that the rental is only $1 an acre per year?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is a pretty good rental on prospecting land.

Mr. NUGENT. I understand that that continues during the existence of the lease and would continue even after coal had been found in paying quantities.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly; and if coal was found in paying quantities, it would be assumed that the royalties would take care of that.

Mr. NUGENT. The royalties are fixed at a sum not to exceed 20 cents per ton.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I move to amend by striking out, on page 5, line 11, the words "except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year."

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. NUGENT. Yes; I yield the floor.

Mr. FALL. I wanted to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. NUGENT. Very well.

Mr. FALL. The lands that it is now proposed to handle under this leasing proposition are grazing lands almost inevitably, otherwise they would have been taken up for agricultural purposes by homesteaders long ago. The only provision we have ever had proposed in Congress for the disposition of these lands through which disposition any income might be yielded was upon the proposition that they should be leased at a maximum of 1½ cents an acre per year. Under the provisions of this lease a man securing a prospecting permit has the exclusive use or right to the entire surface area as distinguished from the subsoil area. His purpose, of course, is primarily to secure the oil. The object in placing the rental at the high figure of 25 cents an acre, which no cattleman or stockman could pay, and grading up to $1, is to compel him to do something to develop the subsoil product of the particular land. There is no conceivable use that he could make of the surface of the land which would justify him in paying from 25 cents to $1 an acre. So it is simply to compel him in good faith to go ahead and develop it for the purposes of this act, which are to secure oil, that this rental is fixed. The object is to get the oil produced, and incidentally, and only incidentally, the object is to obtain a revenue for the Government of the United States from the oil. As to the revenue which the Government will obtain if the act, as it is drawn, is effective, in so far as the revenue to the United States Government is concerned, it will be plus where heretofore the revenue has been entirely minus.

The object is to prevent the man who secures an exclusive right to the use of 2,560 acres of land shutting out the cattleman, the sheepman, and the stockman who has been using it from the use of that surface area, the object being simply to prevent him holding it and not developing it, the prime object being to secure the development of the minerals underneath it. Therefore if the minerals underneath produce an income he is to be credited upon his total rental with the amount which he pays for the surface area. If they do not produce an income, he, nevertheless, pays anywhere from five times to twenty times as much as any other proportionate acreage is paying in the shape of revenue to the United States Government under any system. We never secure more than 3 to 5 cents per acre for grazing purposes upon any of the State lands in the Southwest rented in any kind of area. The maximum is 5 cents. Here you are providing a minimum of 25 cents per acre for rental for the use of that land.

Mr. NUGENT. Oil land?

Mr. FALL. This is the surface.

Mr. NUGENT. That is very true, but beneath the surface the supposition is that there are large quantities of oil. If the man who leased had not that idea, it is a certainty he would not enter into the lease.

Mr. FALL. Certainly; but the point I am endeavoring to explain to the Senator is that for the use of the land under this bill you will get from five to twenty times as much as you could get through any other possible measure of legislation.

Mr. NUGENT. My amendment, if the Senator will pardon me for interrupting him, does not interfere in any way, shape, or form with levying that rental.

Mr. FALL. Certainly it does not. You are just establishing a system of double taxation which you as an individual would never submit to in your State under any circumstances.

Mr. NUGENT. If I thought or had good reason to believe that I would strike oil on 2,560 acres of Government land, I do not think I would hesitate about going into the venture because of the fact that I would have to pay 25 cents an acre for the surface.

Mr. FALL. Probably not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to call attention to the effect which the amendment of the Senator from Idaho will have. The great Midwest Oil Co. will not care if it is compelled to pay 25 cents or 50 cents or $1 an acre, but there may be a person who has discovered a well flowing, say, 5 barrels a day. His royalty during, say, the fifth year, may or may not amount to $2,560. It is the little man who will get hurt if the Senator insists upon his amendment. The Senator now wants the little man not only to pay the dollar an acre for his land, but he wants him to pay a royalty as well, and in that case perhaps the man who is producing 5 barrels of oil a day would not have enough from the profits on all the oil he produced to pay more than the royalty. But in this case he would have to pay double the amount. I think the bill is right just as it is.

Mr. FALL. I will add to what I have said, as a concrete illustration, to impress Senators who do not know, as we from the West do know, the fact that the only producing well in my State so far which has any oil in it is a 40-barrel pumping proposition on private land, and it can not be used at all, because you can not pump the oil and market it for its cost.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I propose the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, at the end of line 7, add:

The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to place an embargo against the exportation of oil, whether produced under the provisions of this act or otherwise.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the situation is like this, as I understand it: Several nations of the world are seeking to acquire the oil of the world, whether it is in Mexico, South America, the United States, Persia, or Peru. We ought to be in a position to protect the oil of the United States from passing into foreign ownership. This bill relates exclusively, so far as its language is concerned at this time, to oil and other minerals of the soil to be extracted from the public domain under a leasing system; but in the State of California, for instance, there are a great many productive oil wells in private ownership and there is nothing in the California law which prevents a foreign government, through their agents, acquiring these proved and productive oil wells. That process of acquisition is going on to-day. There is no power in the Federal Government to stay the hand of those acquisitive powers.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator from California yield to me?

Mr. PHELAN. In a moment. I offer the amendment as the only means which the Federal Government has of controlling in a small measure the oil that is produced by foreign governments on American soil by giving the power to the President to place an embargo upon its exportation. The principal object to be served, as I see it, would be to deter foreigners from acquiring oil properties in America. It interposes an embarrassment. If they realize that after they have acquired American wells they can not at will export the oil—and their object in a national sense is to get possession of the oil in order to win in the competitive game of navy and the merchant marine—they will not make the investment. That is the object and purpose of the amendment.

Now I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, of course I am very much impressed with the argument of the Senator, but it would apply equally to cotton, for nearly all the nations of the earth have found that they need cotton and that they could not fight a war without cotton. So why not extend the provisions of the amendment to the cotton of the South and to all other products of the United States?

Mr. PHELAN. May I ask the Senator is it true that the foreign governments are now seeking to acquire cotton lands?

Mr. FALL. I have no particular knowledge on the subject, Mr. President, but I can say to the Senate that I can produce information relative to shipments of cotton recently made to Germany. Germany is acquiring cotton, whether she is acquiring the cotton lands or not. Germany can acquire cotton lands, can she not? Is there any law against her doing so?

Mr. PHELAN. I do not know of any law against it. Cotton is necessary for war; but oil is not only necessary for war but in a superlative degree is absolutely necessary for commercial enterprises in peace.

Mr. FALL. In my section of the country the people even in peace times wear cotton clothing; so that cotton is not only a war necessity, but is also, to those of us who can not dress in woolen clothes, a peace necessity.

Mr. PHELAN. I submit that there may be substitutes for cotton.

Mr. FALL. And there may also be substitutes for oil.

Mr. PHELAN. Not for the purpose of developing power, unless it be coal. I would have the amendment apply to coal; but foreign nations are not menacing our coal industry. We have now consumed, I think, at least 40 to 50 per cent of our oil resources, but only 5 per cent of our coal resources.

Mr. FALL. I do not think the Senator is correct about coal, for the most recent available discoveries made by any of our departments during this war is the use of colloidal fuel, which is a combination of coal held in a mechanical solution with the oil that the Senator is talking about.

Mr. PHELAN. Well, I will combine both the coal and oil in the amendment if that will satisfy the Senator.

Mr. FALL. Make it general, giving the President in peace times the power to embargo any export, and I suppose we shall all vote for it.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there was an amendment to the proviso found on page 2, beginning with line 2, which is not to be found in the bill as reported. I desire to read that amendment. It is as follows:

That no alien shall, by stock ownership or otherwise, own any interest in a lease acquired under the provisions of this act except with a specific provision in such lease authorizing the President, in his discretion, to take over and operate such lease, paying just compensation to the owner for the use of tools, appliances, machinery, and products, or to acquire at the market price all or any portion of the products of such leased property: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may require the sale for consumption in the United States of all or any portion of the products of any leased property in which it appears that any alien has an interest by stock ownership or otherwise.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from California opposed that.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware of that, and was going to call the attention of the Senate to that fact.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Senator from California opposed that because he was in favor of the committee bill which absolutely denied to foreigners the right to acquire stock in companies organized under the provisions of the bill. So my position is very much stronger than the position taken by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. We shall not again go over that provision at this time; but the Senator from California knows the reason why the Senate rejected the provision as reported. Outside of that, we have given the President certain power and we have given the Secretary of the Interior certain power in the amendment offered to the bill as reported to the Senate; and I have no doubt that the amendment just offered should be defeated.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram from certain residents of Los Angeles, Calif., and ask that it may be read. I do so not that it expresses at all my views, but because I think the views of any number of our constituents are entitled to be heard when they present them to us.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., August 17, 1919.

Hon. HIRAM W. JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned citizens of the United States interested in the mineral development of the West, do hereby protest against the passage of any land or mineral leasing bill of any nature whatsoever. Such a measure perpetually removes vast areas from State and county taxation and penalizes every industry in the West by unjust and unconstitutional royalties and direct taxes. We demand that a thorough investigation be made of all connections between this measure and the recent acquirement by purchase of immense mineral and oil lands by the English Empire in California and other western States. We are instituting mandamus proceedings to compel the attorney general of California to institute proceedings to confiscate all California lands which can be shown to be the property of England or other foreign Governments. Widely circulated reports indicate that this legislation for Government land leasing is to drive all American prospectors and developers of oil properties off the public domain so as to establish a world oil monopoly for the English Empire. This legislation to lease public lands and exclude American citizens from the public domain is not only unconstitutional but will drive thousands of oil and mineral prospectors into a spirit of resentment and will spread Bolshevism into dangerous proportions. We wish this read on the open floor of both the Senate and House and not buried in the secrecy of committee rooms. Calling mass meetings throughout West. Mailing 1,000 more names.

Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN].

Mr. KING. I was called from the Chamber when the amendment was offered, and I ask that it may be again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 7, it is proposed to insert as a separate paragraph the following:

The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to place an embargo against the exportation of oil whether produced under the provisions of this act or otherwise.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word. I very well understand the attitude of the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and his opposition to any legislation which would permit aliens acquiring any lands—mineral lands, probably the limitation should be—in the United States. The attention of the Senator was called during the debate last week to the fact that, perhaps, Americans have greater oil interests in other countries than they have in the United States, and that our country, in the near future, will be compelled to resort to other countries for the purpose of getting an adequate supply of oil. In line with the statements then made, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a statement by Mr. Edward I. Bell, a very careful investigator and, so far as my information goes, a man of good repute and standing in the journalistic world. In yesterday's New York Times appeared an article written by Mr. Bell, in which considerable information is given to the country upon this subject. Among other things, he states:

It is the Mexican oil belt. Within the limits of this largely Indian-owned and jungle-faced patch of ground are 299 producing wells.

The actual proved capacity of the 299 wells is nearly double that of the entire 230,000 wells of the United States.

We—

That is, the Americans—

own 204 of the 299 wells. The British own 69. Mexicans in association with Spaniards, French, Cubans, and others (mostly residents of Mexico) own 26.

The proved capacity of the 204 American-owned wells—

In that small tract—and Americans own other wells in addition to those which have been developed—exceeds 1,300,000 barrels a day; of the 69 British wells, a little less than 200,000 barrels a day; and of the 26 wells of Mexican and mixed ownership, a little more than 100,000 barrels a day.

One of the American-owned wells, the Cerra Azul (Blue Mountain), of the Mexican Petroleum Co., has a capacity exceeding 300,000 barrels a day—

Equal to one-third of the production of all the oil wells in the United States.

I wish to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that if the amendment just suggested by the Senator from California should be adopted and we should forbid exportation of oil we must expect similar legislation, or perhaps more drastic legislation, at the hands of Mexico. If Mexico so acted we would be the cause of permitting the exportation from Mexico of a much greater quantity of oil produced by American-owned wells than that now yielded by all the wells in the entire United States. Any legislation of the character suggested by the Senator from California, in my humble opinion, would be harmful to our Nation as well as to all classes of people. I would like to see the oil products of the United States retained for use by the Government and the American people. But we must not forget that our oil supply is limited and that we are securing oil in other lands. The oil holdings of American citizens in other countries yield more than the output of the wells in the United States. It would be a shortsighted policy to so legislate as to provoke retaliatory legislation from other nations; we would lose more than we would gain.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, of course no parallel can possibly be drawn between Mexico and the United States. We are trying to conserve our oil for the purpose of its commercial use both by land and sea, whereas Mexico has no use for its oil except for exportation, being a country where there is little of industrial life. The production of oil is a source of very great revenue to Mexico and to the rulers of Mexico, so that there is no danger that they would deny themselves that prosperity by putting an embargo upon exportation, unless indeed they were required to do so by the hostile act of some other country with which we were at war. Therefore I do not consider that it involves any grave danger.

I wish to emphasize the fact that my amendment——

Mr. KING. Before the Senator leaves that, may I ask him a question?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think, admitting that Mexico desires to obtain as much as possible by way of revenue from her oil wells and oil output, that she could accomplish that by a procedure something like that which the Senator suggests, namely, an embargo so far as America is concerned, limiting the embargo to shipments to America, and sell the oil to England or some other of the countries the Senator thinks are trying to obtain a monopoly of all the oil of the world?

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator will agree with me that by such an embargo we do no substantial injury to Mexico itself.

Mr. KING. I grant that.

Mr. PHELAN. Because Mexican nationals are not seeking the privilege of owning oil wells on American soil.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator believe, if we adopted his amendment and put an embargo upon oil, that England could immediately go to Mexico and say, "We will take the product of your wells and distribute it throughout the world; we will get the control of that oil; and you can retaliate upon the United States and pass an embargo on oil so far as the United States is concerned"? Is there a better way in the world for England to get control of the oil of Mexico than that very way? And that, I am fearful, would be the result.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am accomplishing my purpose in bringing about a discussion of this subject. The Senator from Utah is perfectly right in saying that if a country desires to do injury to the United States it might inspire Mexico, having no substantial interest in the matter itself, to do an act which would be hostile. It may do that in any event. Our relations with Mexico are somewhat disturbed, and if this amendment would add in any measure to a further disturbance of those relations, which I can not quite conceive, I would not ask for the adoption of the amendment. But the Senator read his amendment to the committee bill which gives the President power to take over the property of any foreign corporation which might be acquired under this bill, and gives the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, the power to take over the oil itself from any foreign company organized for the purpose of extracting oil from the public domain of the United States. That leaves a greater and wider field open, namely, the privately owned and proved oil properties of the United States, as, for instance, those of California, Oklahoma, and Texas. There is nothing in the amendment of the Senator to prevent foreign governments from getting control of such oil. His amendment relates only to oil extracted from the public domain under the powers granted by this bill. So that the great field is still open.

I am sure there is a disposition upon the part of Congress to regulate the matter. Is there any way within the Federal power to prevent or discourage the acquisition of privately owned American oil wells by foreign governments? I am advised there is no constitutional power in the Congress to prevent it; but if the President had the power to put an embargo upon exportations at any time it might discourage foreign governments from making the investment. That is all there is of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the Senator from California sits down, I should like to ask him a question. The Senator used the word "government." Does any foreign government own any oil wells within the United States, or does the Senator mean to say "nationals of foreign governments"?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I spoke advisedly; I mean foreign governments. The foreign governments do not own in their own name these oil properties, but I am credibly informed by one of the most reliable men in this country—and I introduced it the other day in my address—that the Royal Dutch Shell Co. is owned substantially by the British Government; that is to say, the British Government owns the Anglo-Persian Co., just as they own the Suez Canal, by owning a majority of its shares; and that when the oil properties were acquired by Great Britain at a public sale by the alien property custodian during the war in England, the British Government came into possession of a majority of the shares of the Anglo-Persian Co., and the Anglo-Persian Co. owns the Royal Dutch Shell; so the British Government itself, by owning the preponderating interest in the Anglo-Persian Co., actually owns the Royal Dutch Shell.

Now, the Royal Dutch Shell has subsidiaries all over the world, and they have, among others, the Dutch Shell Co. of California. Therefore the British Government owns the Dutch Shell Co. of California. It is a mere deraignment of title that I describe. I repeat, my information is that the control of the Royal Dutch Shell Co. was, before the war, owned by the British Petroleum Co. This company was owned by German stockholders, and their shares were bought, when offered by the British alien property custodian during the war, by the Anglo-Persian Co., which is owned by the British Government. So the British Government owns in fact the Royal Dutch Shell and its subsidiaries. Now, what we want to do is to discourage, let us say, the British Government or the French Government from buying any more American oil properties. How shall we do it?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I should like to ask what the Senator is reading from, and from what source his information comes as to the ownership of these companies. Is it from the report of Mr. Van. H. Manning?

Mr. PHELAN. It is not, although the Manning report confirms it, so far as it goes.

Mr. FALL. Well, from whom—Mr. Requa?

Mr. PHELAN. It is not from Mr. Requa.

Mr. FALL. Then I should like to ask where it comes from, because I have contrary information here on my desk.

Mr. PHELAN. I have a letter here from a man named Tweedie, who has denied it. I do not know who Mr. Tweedie is. I believe he is an oil broker in New York; but my informant is probably one of the best-known men interested in these matters in the United States, and he gave it to me in confidence, and I do not feel quite justified in using his name; but I should be very glad to give the information privately to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, when I am treating with anything that is before the Senate, and I am asking them to vote yes or no, I will not ask them to vote blindly upon some matter which I hold in confidence. Now, I have some information, and it may be the intention of my informant to give it to me in confidence. I do not accept it in confidence, and I never do accept any information which would influence my action which I can not impart to the Senate of the United States when I am trying to influence them. My information, direct from California, the Senator's own State, and from the Shell Co. itself, by telegram—and if they make a misstatement about it undoubtedly the truth can be ascertained—is as follows:

Sixty per cent of Shell Co. stock held by Royal Dutch in Holland and 40 per cent in hands of Shell Transport & Trading Co., of London. Neither British Government nor Holland Government control this business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has either Government any stock in it at all?

Mr. FALL. I think not; but I am reading it for exactly what it is worth to me.

Mr. PHELAN. Does the Senator state from whom the telegram was received?

Mr. FALL. I said it was from the Dutch Shell Co., operating in the Senator's own State of California.

Mr. PHELAN. Well, of course, it would be in the interest of the Dutch Shell Co. to make it so appear.

Mr. FALL. Undoubtedly it would. Nevertheless, until the Senator will disclose his information to the contrary, I believe that the Shell Co., of California, is telling the truth.

Mr. FALL subsequently said: Mr. President, in my remarks of a few moments hence I referred to a telegram from the Dutch Shell Co. At the request of several Senators I should like to have this telegram inserted following those remarks which I made in answer to the Senator from California.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., August 22, 1919.

JAMES SHERIDAN,
1127 Woodward Building, Washington, D. C.:

At request of Gen. Andrews we submit following information: Shell Co. of California took over holdings of California Oil Fields (Ltd.), January 1, 1914. California Oil Fields (Ltd.), British corporation, engaged in oil production since 1902. Its production in 1909, 4,600,000 barrels; 1910, 4,500,000 barrels; 1911, 4,200,000 barrels; 1912, 4,900,000 barrels; 1913, 5,300,000 barrels. Since Shell Co. took over properties California Oil Fields (Ltd.), 1914, production has been as follows: Nineteen hundred and fourteen, 4,300,000 barrels; 1915, 3,100,000 barrels; 1916, 4,700,000 barrels; 1917, 6,300,000 barrels; 1918, 6,700,000 barrels. Decrease in production during 1914 and 1915 entirely due to shutting down of wells pending construction own pipe line to seaboard and refinery at terminal. Increased production since 1915 not due to extension holdings, but merely to more intensive development. Although Shell Co. has extended its holdings since it took over properties from California Oil Fields (Ltd.), none of those have contributed to increased production. Most of those extensions have been abandoned again as giving no prospects. No Government land has been acquired. Production of Shell Co. only 6 per cent of total production of California. Ninety to ninety-five per cent of Shell Co.'s products are marketed locally, the remaining being small quantities shipped to Vancouver, British Columbia, few cargoes of kerosene to Orient, and very small quantities of lubricating oil shipped abroad. Sixty per cent of Shell Co. stock held by Royal Dutch in Holland and 40 per cent in hands of Shell Transport & Trading Co., of London. Neither British Government nor Holland Government control this business.

SHELL CO. OF CALIFORNIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHELAN. I reserve a vote in the Senate on that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will have to offer it again in the Senate. It has been rejected in the Committee of the Whole, and will have to be reoffered in the Senate.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I have lying on the desk an amendment which I should like to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to mine and develop coal, oil, and gas in any lands belonging to the United States, and to operate the mines and wells under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, when in his discretion the public exigency may require that it shall be done.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, one of the Senators has suggested that business principles should be applied to the settlement of this question and in the consideration of this legislation, and I think he was right about it. It seems to me time that some business principles were applied, and that they ought to be applied in the interest of the United States of America, whom this Congress is supposed to represent.

It has been stated here, and is doubtless true, that the nation that controls the oil and coal of the world will dominate the commerce of the world. Nobody disputes that proposition. It is further conceded that the United States of America must have oil and must have coal to operate its Navy and to take care of its merchant marine. It is further known to be true that 40 per cent of the available or indicated oil supply of the United States has already been exhausted. We produce and mine and export 70 per cent of the annual world production of oil. These oils, if there be any in these lands of the United States, belong to the Government. The Government's need for the fuel and the oil is great. It is going to be greater. Why should not the Government that owns the land and owns the oil and has a necessity for the use of the oil in the operation of its Navy and its merchant marine develop the oil on its own land?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that the Government of the United States has not, though it owns coal lands, mined its coal. The Senator knows that some other Governments have attempted to mine their coal. Notwithstanding the fact that the United States has not mined its own coal, it has been able to purchase coal at the mouth of the tunnels for years, and until the war broke out, for from $1 per ton to $1.50 per ton. New Zealand, Newfoundland, England, and other countries of the world were unable to mine coal as cheaply as the private enterprise of the American people enabled them to do; so that without the Government going into the mining of coal it was able to obtain what it required, at as low a rate and in many instances a lower rate than other Governments were able to acquire it. My information is that for several years prior to the war the American people were able to obtain coal at a lower price than that prevailing in most countries. In my opinion private persons or corporations will mine coal and produce oil much cheaper than the Government can mine or produce these products. And when produced the Government can purchase it, or if the proprietors of the mines refuse to sell, the Government can requisition in times of peace as well as in times of war at the market value. So that there is no necessity for the Government becoming a proprietor, investing capital, and going into the business of prospecting on the public domain for the purpose of finding oil and trying to develop it, and incurring the risks and the hazards that are always incident to such undertakings.

Mr. KIRBY. Then, if the Government can not develop coal or produce coal as cheaply or as readily as it can purchase coal, and the supply is sufficient, there never will be a public exigency that would require the President to mine the coal. That is a sufficient answer, it seems to me, to that. But why should we have somebody else exploit the Government's land in the production of this coal? Where does the demand come from that has been talked about here for the last 12 years? Who has been demanding that the Government oil lands be opened to exploitation here? That is what I should like to get at. Who is making the demand? The Senator from Utah says that he does not believe in the leasing system, that it is inherently wrong, and he has finally persuaded himself to support the bill.

Mr. KING. The Senator refers to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. May I ask the Senator a question? Does the Senator believe that the United States Government can develop and operate oil wells as economically as private capital?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly, the United States Government can operate oil wells. When it owns the land it owns the oil.

Mr. MYERS. Does the Senator think the United States Government can operate the railroads as economically as private capital?

Mr. KIRBY. I think it can do it, but it has not done it.

Mr. MYERS. Why has it not done it?

Mr. KIRBY. Because it turned the railroads back to the people who managed them and guaranteed them a dividend without regard to the manner in which they operated them.

Mr. MYERS. They might do the same thing with regard to the oil wells.

Mr. KIRBY. They ought not to do it; and they would not do it if proper legislation were enacted here.

Mr. FALL. Does the Senator want an answer to his question as to who is demanding this legislation?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. FALL. The Senator has his own idea, possibly, from the course that he has taken in offering amendments, as to who is demanding it, but I want to give him my view.

The first people who are demanding it are the people of the Western States, such as mine, whose resources are held back by those who believe as the Senator does. The people of the West are taxing themselves for the maintenance of peace and order and the enforcement of their own laws and the United States laws on the public domain through an enormous area; for building roads 1 mile of which may benefit the taxable property while it will benefit ten times as much property belonging to the United States Government; whose courts are not supported by the Government of the United States, whose officials—State, county, municipal, or otherwise—are not supported in any way by the United States, and whose desire it is to render themselves self-supporting and to actually be in the Union on an equality with the State of the Senator and the other States of the Union under the constitutional guaranty. That is one of the demands.

Another is the natural patriotic demand which all American citizens have—to build up their country, not to hold it back but to develop it, to see, for instance, the cut-over swamp lands in the Senator's State turned into rice fields, as has been done within the last few years, to progress, to go forward. Those are some of the people who want it.

Third, of course, is the ambition of the American who has no other outlet for his ambition to make money, to become prosperous, to raise a family, to build up a State, to realize that he is doing something in this world of ours, and that is the principal demand.

The bill, as has been stated here time and again, and the Senator has referred to it, is not entirely satisfactory. It is not by any means satisfactory to those of us who entertain those views and who live in the Western States, because we believe in the old Anglo-Saxon doctrine that a man's house is his castle, and, built upon that, we believe in individual initiative and not in Government ownership or operation of anything. That we have understood to be the Anglo-Saxon heritage of our people in this country.

Those of us who entertain those ideas are demanding legislation along these lines. We can not get what we want because of the fact that those who have used their inheritance, as the people of Arkansas very largely and people of other States, are now desiring to say how we shall use ours; not only that it should be reserved, but they would tell us exactly how we are to handle it if it is turned loose.

I want to say a word further to the Senator. He has been asking questions with reference to Government development. I am a miner. That is one of my occupations. I have been a practical one. I have worked in quartz mines with my own hands for wages for myself. I make the broad assertion here that never has there been a mine opened in the United States by geological or other experts—I mean discovered, found, and developed in any way by a geological or mining expert or mining engineer. It is the individual, the American, who goes out, sleeps on his blankets, punches his burro loaded with frying pan and coffee pot and pick and shovel and a stick or two of dynamite and a hammer. He is the man who has discovered and made possible the development of the great mineral wealth of this country, which has poured into the laps of the people of the United States over $8,000,000,000 saved, not eaten up, but here now and which they are using. He is the man who has done it, and is one of the men who are demanding legislation of this kind because he can get no other.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I had not expected, of course, to make a lengthy speech when I commenced. I had only intended to devote a little of my time and the time of the Senate to a discussion of the amendment I have proposed. Another matter I should like to suggest for consideration of the Senate is that the friends of this bill have taken about nine-tenths of the time in discussing it, and that anyone who does not seem to be in favor of it is continually given the opportunity to listen to an explanation of the beauties of the bill.

Answering the Senator's question, who says he is not in favor of the Government owning or operating anything, I am in favor of the Government continuing to own and operate the Navy, and I am in favor of increasing the Navy of the United States, with the Government facilities and business and power to operate it, until it shall excel the power of any other navy on earth; and I think that conditions within the next six months will justify that expression of opinion and belief largely in the minds of the people.

We have a merchant marine that we have talked about developing. We have built many ships at the expense of the Government. We built those ships because the exigencies required that the Government should go into the business, that private enterprise of the country was unequal to it. We have expended the people's money for the ships that have been constructed. The necessity exists for the transportation of our commerce across the seas, and why should not those ships be retained by the Government and be used in carrying the commerce of the United States? The ocean is certainly free, and it is supposed that we have the right to the use of the high seas. The ocean does not need to be repaired. The Government owns the ships—it has built and paid for the ships, it has paid for the transportation facilities—and why not let the Government own and control its own merchant marine? It ought to be done.

There is another question. The Senator has said it is not fair to the Western States that they should pay taxes for the roads when the Government has a great deal of property in the States and is not developing the country and is not paying taxes. Then, it is better, in place of exploiting the Government lands for the benefit of private individuals, to let the Government pay a just proportion of the taxes toward those improvements, and I favor that being done.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Has the Senator offered to take a dollar of the people's money, the taxpayers' money, for the exploitation of those lands to see whether the Government can discover oil or not?

Mr. KIRBY. No; but I say it ought to be done. That is what I am talking about now.

Mr. FALL. Then go at it in that way.

Mr. KIRBY. That is exactly what I am endeavoring to do here.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas whether his amendment ought not to be accompanied by a little appropriation?

Mr. KIRBY. I have no disposition not to put an appropriation on it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How much would the Senator like to vote for in that connection?

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to vote whatever is necessary.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How much would the Senator think necessary?

Mr. KIRBY. You might have a million dollars to start with. That would start out a good big army of prospectors.

Mr. FALL. I can say for the Senator's information, and I will guarantee that I can prove it later if he wants the statistics, that in the western oil fields to-day, in the petroleum industry alone, the individuals are putting in money with the expectation that they will be compelled to put in an aggregate sum of approximately $25,000,000 in the endeavor to exploit these lands.

The Senator was not here possibly when I spoke of the first cost of an oil well itself, and does not know that when a man has developed his oil well 40 wells need pumping where one is a gusher. He does not possibly realize that when a man gets a gusher he is then just commencing to find his difficulties. Where is his market? How far is he from the railroad? How will he get his oil shipped? How does he get it to the railroad? Does the Senator imagine that he takes a bucket in one hand and a gallon pot in the other, and carries his oil from the well 25 or 30 miles to the railroad? No; you must build an oil line; you must have reserve tanks. If your well is a going well, you must have it in such shape that you can save the oil, because the bill compels you to do it. You must expand and adapt your reservoirs to the situation and then get some method of piping your oil. It can only be done by piping. Oil pipes to-day to conduct the ordinary flow of oil from any well will cost not less than $2 per foot.

Mr. KIRBY. I was talking about finding the oil. We are trying to find the oil first.

Mr. FALL. Yes; and I have known of 40 or 50 or even 70 per cent of mining companies that have made failures, that spent their stockholders' money exactly by following the same theory by which you would spend uselessly the taxpayers' money. I have known them to proceed exactly as the Senator has talked, about making a discovery, and then go ahead and build with an eye to the future.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a brief suggestion?

When the Government goes to tax itself to find oil or any other mineral, you will find that the experience of the world has been not only with oil but all the precious metals that I would say a fair estimate is that five to ten times more has been put into the ground in all these enterprises than was ever taken out of the ground. If the Government went into the hazardous business of prospecting, the result would be that it would get one oil well that would pay and 500 that had no oil in them, and the Government would be bearing the loss instead of the individual enterprises, the ambition and hope of the poor prospectors, who have lost that amount of money. It would break the Government in four years for the Government to attempt to spend what would be spent by the individuals in trying to develop the resources of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator might add that it would cost the Government at least twice as much as it would cost the individuals.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Easily; and then you have it beyond the power to reach except by the taxation of every individual in the country in a very doubtful enterprise. One in fifty probably succeeds.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, the disclosures made by the Senator may be correct in a limited way, but they do not disturb me or make me fear that anything is going to break the Government after we have been through this last war and had the frightful strain on the Government that has been put upon it by the necessity for preparation for and the conduct of the war.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. We have not paid for that yet.

Mr. KIRBY. It is suggested that private enterprise would do better in developing than the Government could do. Just in answer to that let me ask, While the war emergency was on what did private enterprises do but get in behind the Government and get the Government to come to their aid? They said we want so much money out of the Government Treasury to develop the mines that have already been found and are producing; we must have money; and the Government put it up. They had to rely on the Government under those conditions. They asked for help and they got it. There is the difference. What is wrong with the Government taking its own oil out of its own land and using it for the purposes for which oil necessarily must be used and consumed? Is there anything wrong with the proposition from any standpoint?

I will ask, Who is behind the demand for this legislation? I have had four answers to the question and none of the Senators have answered it yet.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The trouble is that when the oil is merely discovered the work is only begun. When the oil is dug out of the ground the work has only begun.

Mr. KIRBY. I understand that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In the first place, you have to find it in the ground.

Mr. KIRBY. Yes; but you know it is there after you have found it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but you do not know it until you do find it. You have to sink a well, and you may not strike it.

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. You may sink another well and you may not find it. You have to take, in the first place, all the chances that the ordinary mining prospector takes, and after you have done that you have to find the means of transportation, you have to build a pipe-line system, and then when you get your pipe-line system in operation you have either got to turn it over to the Standard Oil Co. to refine it or you have to build a refinery, and when you build your refinery you have got to build manufactories in order to produce all the by-products or you will be developing your oil uneconomically. When you do all this you have to build up your market organization in order to market it. So I submit to the Senator the man is only at the margin of the proposition even after he digs the oil.

Mr. KIRBY. I can not see where the Government would be at any more of a disadvantage in discovering oil and digging and producing oil and refining and marketing oil. It does not need any market for oil. It could supply the market itself for the entire output. I do not see any argument in that at all.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. Do I understand the Senator to say that during the prosecution of the war the Government was called upon to furnish money for the opening of mines in the United States?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. What mines?

Mr. KIRBY. I do not know. There was a bill here appropriating so many million dollars for that purpose.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is mistaken. There may have been a bill introduced for that purpose. There are bills introduced for all kinds of appropriations, but I am sure the Senator is in error when he states that the Government was called upon during the war to supply money for the opening and exploitation of mines.

Mr. KIRBY. I understood that we provided so many million dollars for the production of certain ores in the emergency.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. FALL. The bill to which the Senator evidently refers was a bill reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining, and advocated by the chairman of that committee very successfully. The then chairman of the committee, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], sits behind the Senator at this moment, and he can inform him about it. It was a bill for the encouragement of the development of tungsten, manganese, and other minerals of that character which this country was not producing. It did not provide any Government appropriation whatsoever for the assistance of any miners or the opening of mines, but it did provide that the Government might intrust some individual to operate a mine of these valuable minerals, and if he would not operate it the Secretary of the Interior might take it and operate it himself, and it did provide certain funds for work of that kind.

Mr. KIRBY. I think that is unimportant, anyway.

Mr. FALL. The Senator asked a question which can not be answered except by an explanation. The Senator said my explanation a few moments ago, as to who was behind this bill, did not explain; that he had heard no explanation.

Mr. KIRBY. I did not regard it as sufficient.

Mr. FALL. I think I know what the Senator has in mind, possibly, and I think it is erroneous. The Senator has in mind, possibly, those of us from the West who say that we do not get favors from the Government, and therefore there must be some other influence behind it than those which I have explained as existing.

The Senator may have more or less knowledge concerning oil mining—how it is done in Texas. I think possibly he has some personal experience as to how they proceed to dig wells in Texas for the development of oil lands. In the development of mineral lands of any other kind or character it is possible to make a discovery on the surface, and following that discovery on the surface the poor man, following his burro with his pick and shovel and camp outfit, may be able to do enough work to ascertain whether or not it is of sufficient value to justify him in continuing the work or seeking capital for that purpose. But in making an oil discovery it is not possible to do it. The laws of the United States have been very defective. While they allowed a unit of 20 acres to an individual and 160 acres to an association of individuals to constitute a placer location, yet the department has ruled that the location was not good or effective until after a discovery had been made. So, under the law existing to-day, the consequence was that where you have to go 2,000 or 3,000 feet, unless you can have exclusive possession of your placer claim, of course you are not justified in gambling $100,000 on it. That is what it means. If exclusive possession could be obtained, if the Senator will join me now and assure me that through his efforts and mine two years' time should be granted under the placer laws of the United States to every locator of 160 acres in which to make a discovery of oil, I will agree to vote against this bill and for such a proposition; but we have not such a law.

The consequence is you can not raise the money on a placer claim located under the present law. Those of us who believe, as I do, in individual initiative, which has built up this country, much prefer the placer law as it exists, provided we shall have time after making a location on the ground to make the discovery before some one else shall come in and take it away from us. That is the system in which we believe; but the conservationists, under the lead of gentlemen who were mentioned here a day or two ago, have been successful in fastening upon the people of the United States their theories of governmental reservation and control of our underground riches. Therefore, we have not been able to get either of the departments to agree with us that the old law should simply be amended so as to make it fit the petroleum case. They have insisted not only that petroleum but now potash and other deposits of like character should remain in such condition as that the Government shall not part with the fee. Heretofore we have developed our mineral wealth by securing the fee. Now, the policy has been changed, and, as we could not get the assistance of the departments, and met with the opposition of very many earnest and sincere men who believe in Government ownership, in our effort to be permitted to develop the petroleum deposits, as we have developed coal mines and the quartz mines under the old system, we have been compelled to meet them more than halfway and submit to the Government retaining the fee and restrictive rights, and to adopt a lease system. We have done that simply and solely because we did not want our resources tied up. New Mexico wants an equality under the Constitution and laws of the United States with the State of Arkansas. That is what is behind this bill.

Mr. KIRBY. I certainly shall concede that New Mexico ought to have as much right as any other State, and it has under the operation of the law, in my judgment.

Now, as to the demand for the bill. Senators have heard the explanations given; they have heard every Senator who is advocating the bill say he did not favor it; that is, that he was not for the principle; that it was wrong and ought not to be enacted, but——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator does not want to make quite so sweeping an assertion as that.

Mr. KIRBY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. LENROOT. This is the kind of a bill for which I have been fighting for a good many years, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. The Senator is an exception; but I have heard three Senator's make the statement which I have just repeated.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I take occasion to rise to say that the principle of the bill has my full indorsement.

Mr. KIRBY. Well, there are two Senators who have made that statement. It seems that I misunderstood them, if they have spoken on the question at all.

The point I am trying to get at is that the Senators who are opposed to the principle or who are opposed to this method of legislation are favoring it now because they think it is the best they can possibly procure from Congress, and they think the necessity exists for the development of these oil fields. I presume that is the explanation.

Evidently all of the people are not demanding the passage of this bill, for a telegram has just been read here from a thousand people in California who are opposed to it. They say it is wrong in principle; that it will be injurious in its operation and effect. They speak directly; they live in an oil-producing State and state what the condition is.

Senators say that they do not want the resources of the country tied up; that they want them developed; that they want the riches uncovered and distributed among the people of the Nation; and it is said that private enterprise can do that better than can governmental enterprise under the conditions. Then Senators go on and say that it takes much money to develop an oil well. What is proposed to be done? To give a man who discovers oil 640 acres of land and then to let him have 1,920 acres more—2,560 acres altogether—and to let him have it for 20 years before there is any readjustment and any different arrangement about the payment of royalty; and then to allow him to have it 10 years longer without a readjustment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Why should such a man not have the land all of his life?

Mr. KIRBY. Well, we will get to that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is the reason I object to the bill, because it is proposed to put this limitation on a man's industry. That is the reason why the people to whom the Senator from Arkansas refers object to the bill, because it makes a purely private enterprise a socialistic governmental affair.

Mr. KIRBY. But this is Government land yet; it is hardly a private enterprise until the Government makes some sort of a disposition of it. However, I am calling attention to the other side of the proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KIRBY. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. If it is Government land, would the Senator from Arkansas be opposed to providing that the Government should pay taxes upon it?

Mr. KIRBY. I should favor the Government paying sufficient taxes to assist in local improvements.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but the Government does not even pay a dollar of taxes.

Mr. KIRBY. It ought to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only that, but the Government of the United States in the Western States has in many cases withdrawn half of the area of the State; and every head of cattle, every sheep, every animal that goes upon the land and eats a little grass from it is charged for at so much per head.

Mr. KIRBY. That is a wrong policy. I think the Government ought to pay on its property a fair amount for the development of local improvements, and I am willing to provide for that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. KIRBY. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas if he is of the opinion that there is any probability that the Government will do the thing which he says he favors?

Mr. KIRBY. I think it is right and that it ought to be done. The Senator from New Mexico is here; what does he think about it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not think the Government is going to do it. I think the Senator from Arkansas is, perhaps, the only Member of this body who would vote in favor of the Government paying taxes to the States on the land which it owns in the respective States.

Mr. KIRBY. I did not say that, and I do not say it now.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And the Senator from Arkansas certainly will realize that something should be done in this case. If the plan which he proposes has no possibility of adoption then he ought to be willing to come to some other reasonable arrangement, which Senators have been working for and which they have concluded will, in a measure, meet the existing situation.

Mr. KIRBY. I do not agree that some particular thing ought to be or has to be done; but I will come to that in a minute.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I introduced here the latter part of last week a bill covering this matter, and I am sorry to find that my friend from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] has already expressed some opposition to it. I desired to bring this question to a test and proposed to establish a precedent. The Government now has great forest reserves, amounting to something like 11,000,000 acres in my State, comprising the most valuable land in the State, and embracing 52 per cent, I believe, of the area of the State, forcing the State to live on the remainder, the unoccupied portion of which is the very essence of a desert. I have introduced a bill providing that the Government shall pay 2 cents an acre on the forest reservations in my State to help build roads on those reservations.

Mr. KIRBY. That is all right.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And also to help develop the State in a measure. I have already, however, met opposition by my friend from New Mexico, who has had experience with the Land Office, and I know from an experience of something like 30 years in public life how difficult it is to get the Government to provide any remedy after taking everything in the State.

That has been the trouble with us from the start. If all would be as liberal as my friend from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and I could get the consent of this body that the Government pay the miserable sum of 2 cents an acre for the 11,000,000 acres that it has reserved from State use, or, as it has done in the case of Washington City, assist us on a 50–50 basis when it takes 50 per cent of our resources, I should be much pleased. I merely suggest, as other Senators have suggested, that we are in a position here where something must be done. I am opposed to this bill because it is too much in the line of what the Senator himself wants—simply on that account—too much in line with what he is seeking for. I am with those California protestants who want this land free for developme by the individual and the Government to keep its hands off.

We are in a condition now where we can not develop oil or coal in the western section of the country. If a man discovers a coal field the Government comes and makes a reserve out of it; and then that is the end of it, no matter how many years he has been working on it. Under this bill we are trying to get from under those conditions, and when we who are on the extreme other end have made all the concessions in order to get any development whatever, it seems to me strange that our friends from the East should now try to frustrate our efforts, take the heart out of us, and aim to go further than even this bill goes.

If Senators will think for a moment and remember that everything is now in such a condition that we can not do anything, that we are trying to get from under present conditions and see if we can not do something, I believe they will appreciate the necessity for action. I do not believe this bill will be a complete success, but it is the only earthly chance we have.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I do not, of course, favor the Government paying taxes on its land in any particular case; but the Government ought to make a sufficient appropriation of money to constitute an equitable pro rata of the expense of making necessary improvements in the particular States where lands are reserved, and I am in favor of that being done.

It is said that the Government can not be induced to do anything. Why can it not? Who constitutes the Government? Is not the Senate a part of this Government of the United States? If the Senate thought this or thought the other thing ought to be done, it certainly could say so. There is no use of saying that you can not do this thing or that thing or the other thing until you have tried it and failed.

In regard to the development of these lands it is said that it requires so much money that you have got to give the man who gets a location a 20-year lease on 2,500 acres of land, and that you have got to give him a 10-year lease at the end of the first 20 years. Many of the oil fields are absolutely exhausted at the end of four or five or six years. That is true; nobody will question that at all.

Now, as to the value of the oil when it is produced. Talk about the poor locator who has only been able to develop a well that will furnish 10,000 or 15,000 or 30,000 barrels of oil a day! How long would it take him to pay for the expense at the rate of 30,000 barrels of oil a day at $1.80 a barrel?

The Senator from Wisconsin said that business principles must be applied to this matter. He says that a man would not lease a building for five years at a certain amount and at the end of five years agree that somebody else might go in and bid against him. Certainly a building would not be leased under those circumstances, but if enough oil is produced in one day to pay the expense for 30 years, why should there not before 10 years be a readjustment of conditions?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator know of any well now upon the public domain or any prospect of any well upon any land covered by this bill that will be anything like as productive as the well of which the Senator is speaking?

Mr. KIRBY. I have as much faith in the oil-producing public lands as the Senator has. He thinks they are worth exploiting and that this bill ought to be passed. There are being discovered wells of that kind in Texas, and wells of a most remarkable productive capacity have been discovered in Mexico. Why might they not be discovered upon the public domain?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And in Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. There have been none discovered in Arkansas, although I have helped to dig some dry wells myself.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. FALL. Arkansas is a public-land State?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. FALL. How was it developed?

Mr. KIRBY. It was developed by the people who went there.

Mr. FALL. That is all that the people of New Mexico or Colorado or Arizona or any of the other States are asking?

Mr. KIRBY. That is all; that is what I am talking about now.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The remark made by the Senator leads me to ask him if he thinks that there is so much profit in the oil business would it not be a good thing for the Government to go down into Texas and buy some of the oil wells?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly it would.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And prospect some of the land in Texas where it has been demonstrated there is oil?

Mr. KIRBY. I will come to that proposition. That is what I desired to speak of in the first instance, but I have had so many interruptions that I have been diverted. It has been demonstrated that the Government of England is trying to control the oil production of the world. We have great need for our oil from now on. What is being done by the other Governments of the world? Great Britain is handling the situation—

(1) By creating a permanent governmental petroleum department (the petroleum executive under the war cabinet is to be made permanent) with powers and duties as follows: (a) To act as an advisor in petroleum matters to all other branches of His Majesty's Government; (b) to grant concessions for all oil development within the British Empire; and (c) to advise and assist British oil companies in securing concessions, carrying on work, and conducting trade in other countries.

(2) By debarring foreigners and foreign nationals from owning or operating oil-producing properties in the British Isles, colonies, and protectorates.

Prospecting for petroleum or working a petroleum property is lawful in the United Kingdom only for the board of trade or minister of munitions or person or persons authorized by them. (D. O. R. A., 2–A A A, Jan. 31, 1919.)

(3) By direct participation in ownership and control of petroleum companies.

And so on.

In France similar steps are being taken, and the Japanese Government and the Government of Argentina have withdrawn oil fields in their domain from private ownership and development. That is what the other nations of the world are doing. We have exhausted 40 per cent of our indicated oil supply, and why should we not develop the oil in our own lands and keep them withdrawn from private ownership or development?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is it the understanding of the Senator that any foreign countries themselves engage in the business of prospecting for oil and the development of oil territory?

Mr. KIRBY. I do not know that that is true, but I am talking about what the policy is and what they are trying to do.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I undertook to explain this question a few days since, but the trouble about it is that some Senators go out when one branch has been discussed and do not hear the discussion of other topics and then come back and ask questions. The purpose of Argentina, it seems, is this: Argentina has reserved from ordinary location or acquisition under ordinary laws the fee simple to the land including with it the subsoil, the deposits below; but she does not operate or attempt to operate the oil wells of the land herself. If a man desires to acquire the right to operate land, he can go to Argentina and secure a lease. That is what we are trying to provide for under this bill. That is what some people in this country are constantly criticizing those of us who have been interested in Latin America for doing because a lease or a franchise there is known as a concession. An individual can simply go to the Government and under their general law secure a specific right to operate a certain piece of ground. That is what we are proposing to do here. It is a change of the old law. That is all there is of it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to say also for the information of the Senator that we have been pursuing exactly that policy for some time. We have been conveying away our homestead lands, but reserving the mineral rights, that is, the oil and coal. Wherever lands are withdrawn on the suspicion that they contain oil or coal they become subject to homestead entry, but the homestead entryman does not get any oil or coal. That remains subject to disposition by the Government, and this bill provides for the disposition of it. That is the Argentine law as well as ours.

Mr. KIRBY. The report I read from, the regular report, says that these Governments have withdrawn oil fields within their domain from private ownership or development.

Mr. FALL. That is it exactly, Mr. President, if the Senator will yield. That is the point exactly. Heretofore, as the Senator pointed out to the Senator from Arkansas to-day, we have always given the fee of the mines and mineral lands and all to the individual. We are changing that system. He is pointing out now with approval, apparently, the foreign system, the Argentine system, which we are adopting and to which some of us are opposed; but as we can not get any other, we are willing to adopt it.

Mr. KIRBY. As I understand the Senator's position, then, we have withdrawn all this from private development, and now we are opening it to private development. Is that the idea?

Mr. FALL. Why, the Senator has endeavored to explain, and will explain again, that as opposed to Government development and operation we are proposing to allow individual development and operation under Government supervision, paying a tax to the Government upon every gallon of oil taken out.

Mr. KIRBY. I understand that. That is what I say.

Mr. FALL. The Senator apparently wants to drop this system—not only the old system under which we have been operating, of private ownership, but to throw aside the system of private development under Government control, and go into Government ownership and operation.

Mr. KIRBY. When it becomes necessary.

Mr. FALL. Then let us go into it all the way through. Let us apply it to the State of Arkansas. Let us take over the rice production and the cotton production and the lumber production of the State of Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. The Government does not need rice and lumber.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, if it had not been for the fact that the predecessors in interest of the Senator from Arkansas were allowed to develop their own State, there would have been no State of Arkansas, and he might possibly have been a delegate from some portion of the Louisiana Purchase.

Mr. KIRBY. I do not know about that; but we are dealing now with present conditions, and Arkansas is pretty well developed. I am rather proud of the old State.

Mr. FALL. So am I, Mr. President; and I am asking the Senator to join with me in helping me to develop my State.

Mr. KIRBY. And I am perfectly willing to help the Senator to develop his State under conditions which I think are fair to the government and right.

Mr. FALL. Precisely.

Mr. KIRBY. I do not think they are as proposed by this bill. That is what I have been trying to tell everybody here.

Mr. FALL. Why, certainly not. Under the laws existing in Arkansas you took to yourselves every lead mine, every zinc mine. You own them. The Government has nothing to do with them. You own your lumber. The Government has nothing to do with it, except one little forest reserve that exists in your State. You took your own lands in fee. You could build up a State, tax yourselves, and become independent American citizens. You did that, as you say. You do not want us to do it.

Mr. KIRBY. Not at all. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KIRBY. What I am trying to impress on the Senate is the fact that other Governments are withdrawing all their oil fields from private ownership and development, because the necessity seems to require that it shall be done.

Mr. FALL. The Senator is wrong. I have pointed out to him what the other Governments are doing. They are not withdrawing them from development. If the Senator will yield to me just a moment I will explain to him so that if he listens to me now, with his mind open, he will never again make the mistake that he is making now.

Mr. KIRBY. I think I have understood everything the Senator has said.

Mr. FALL. Very well. Then I will simply take time to say that the Senator does not understand at all the subject that he is attempting to discuss.

Mr. KIRBY. Yes; I understand the Senator's position thoroughly, and I do not agree with him at all about it.

Mr. FALL. No; because the Senator does not understand.

Mr. KIRBY. I do not mean, of course, to be discourteous to my friend from New Mexico. I have listened to him——

Mr. FALL. Well, there are some things I meet that are very discouraging.

Mr. KIRBY. I hope the Senator does not think I am discourteous to him, because there was nothing of the kind intended.

Mr. FALL. I know that the Senator is acting in good faith, and I have asked him to listen in good faith to a subject to which I do not think he has paid very much attention.

Mr. KIRBY. I have listened carefully to the Senator, and I think I can understand the English language probably as well as any other man in the Senate. That is the idea I have in my own mind about it, and it is plain here, plainly written. This is what this report says about a particular condition, and I have cited it as a report. I do not question the Senator's statement.

Mr. FALL. May I ask who wrote the report?

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. Requa, I think the name is—M. L. Requa, general director oil division, United States Fuel Administration; Van. H. Manning, Director Bureau of Mines; and George Otis Smith, Director United States Geological Survey. That is the report I am reading, and I am only reading it for what it is worth. That is what it says here, and that is probably what it means.

Now, as to the situation in Mexico:

> Article 27 of the Mexican constitution of 1917 states that "in the nation is vested direct ownership of * * * petroleum and all hydrocarbons—solid, liquid, or gaseous"; also that "only Mexicans by birth or naturalization and Mexican companies have the right to acquire ownership in lands, waters, or their appurtenances, or to obtain concessions to develop mines, waters, or mineral fuels in the Republic of Mexico. The nation may grant the same right to foreigners, provided they agree before the department of foreign affairs to be considered Mexicans in respect to the same, under penalty, in cases of breach, of forfeiture to the nation of property acquired."

That is the condition in Mexico, where the greatest oil wells in the world have been discovered. Even Mexico knows that much.

Mr. FALL. What was that?

Mr. KIRBY. I just read the section of the constitution of Mexico about the development of oil fields hereafter, in which it says that all foreigners must become Mexicans in order to develop them there, or the property must be treated as though they were Mexicans.

Mr. FALL. I should like to know if the Senator is approving article 27 of the Mexican constitution, to which he has referred?

Mr. KIRBY. I am only referring to this to show what Mexico has done or attempted to do.

Mr. FALL. I understand. Does the Senator approve it?

Mr. KIRBY. Why, certainly not; but Mexico has the right to take care of Mexico's interests, and if Mexico thinks that ought to be done, that is her business. I am talking about what has been done.

Mr. FALL. Yes; and the Senator is taking it from a report by men neither one of whom knows what he is talking about with reference to Mexico's laws, nor what she is attempting to do.

Mr. KIRBY. I have conceded the Senator's statement so far as he has made it, and it may go for whatever weight he thinks it is entitled to. I am just reciting this report as made by these officials whose business it was to find out something about it before making the report.

Now, Senators, the only question that I wanted to discuss here was whether the Government of the United States would not do well to continue these lands in Government ownership of the oil in these lands, and to keep them from private development, to keep them for the necessities of the Government when the time shall come that the oil must be used for that purpose. Other nations are doing that. The necessity is great, and is becoming greater all the time. We never will get to a point where we can get along and operate the Navy and the merchant marine without oil and without coal.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. What would the Senator have the Pacific coast do without oil and where would they get it?

Mr. KIRBY. Let the Pacific coast develop the oil that they have or buy it from other people who have it.

Mr. LENROOT. It is in Government hands.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They can not do it.

Mr. KIRBY. Then let the Government go ahead and use these lands and develop them. I say that if the Government needs the oil first and the coal first the Government must have it first.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator understand that the Government could use in the Navy the oil as it comes from the wells?

Mr. KIRBY. Oh, no; but the Senator understands that the oil has to come out of the wells before it can be used.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator intend that the Government shall go into the refining business?

Mr. KIRBY. It could do it.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator, then, intend in addition that the Government shall go into the distributing business?

Mr. KIRBY. My idea is, if the time has come when these oil lands must be exploited or prospected and the oil developed, that since they are in the Government's hands, and since the Government needs the oil in its business, the Government ought to take charge of it and do the developing, and if the time has not come when that should be done, then the Government should retain the lands against the day when it shall come.

Mr. LENROOT. Even at the expense of the business of the country and the needs of the people of the country?

Mr. KIRBY. It is not at the expense of the business of the country. You do not know whether there is any oil down there or not. Nobody knows.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. You just want to save it because you do not know.

Mr. KIRBY. How is the business of the country going to fail to progress without the development of oil unless the oil is there, and why can not the Government develop the oil if it is there? The proposition has just come down to this, and I think the Government should be looking along that line: We have these resources here, possible and contingent. We know that necessity might exist for their use by the Government. We know that that is going to be true. We see that the other great nations of the world have already feared the condition which seems to confront them and are doing all they can to control the supply and have withdrawn their own lands from private development. Now, why should we exploit ours in this way? I do not think it ought to be done.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. We want to do it so as to keep warm and not starve to death.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I feel that I must, in justice to myself, endeavor now to make an explanation, which the Senator can listen to or not, as he pleases.

Under the old civil-law system and the Spanish law, particularly as it existed in Spain and in Latin American countries, and also in all Latin countries, the government owned everything. They adopted an entirely different theory from the old Anglo-Saxon theory of the inherent rights of man. Under their systems man had no rights except what he got from the representative of the Divine Power above, God Almighty, or the state, the czar.

However, the Spaniards were practical men; and so, when they began to develop the riches of the New World they adopted, in 1559, the decree of Don Joan and Donna Boadilla, the King and Queen of Spain, controlling all Spain and all the Indies—this country. They followed in that decree the old decree of 1375 with reference to mining. Under the old law of 1375, all the lands belonging to the Crown, but being granted by the Crown from time to time, the King decreed that the precious minerals and all the metalliferous minerals—as a matter of fact gold, silver, lead, and similar metals—should always remain the property of the Crown, subject to concession by the Crown to private individuals; so that when the Crown parted with the land, read into the title of the land was the reservation with reference to metalliferous minerals.

That decree was followed by one in 1559 which was the last word upon the subject, and was adopted for the benefit of the Indies after the discovery and development of this country by the Spaniards. That decree went further. It provided that not only in the Crown lands should there be the reservation of the minerals—very few Crown lands had been granted here, but many clerical lands had been granted—but that in the titles already issued here should be read the same reservation, with the exception that in the titles already issued should be read the reservations of gold and silver and quicksilver; and Gamboa explains thoroughly in his commentaries the objects which the Spaniards had in these reservations. None of the nonmetalliferous minerals were reserved—none whatsoever, neither sulphur, coal, potash, phosphates, building stone, limestone, the bitumens, the hydrocarbons, no class of nonmetalliferous minerals were reserved; so that when the King or the viceroy of New Spain, or the Audiencia Real at Guadalajara, might thereafter grant a title to a piece of land, in that title was read the reservation of the metalliferous minerals; but the title conveyed distinctly all other minerals of all other kinds whatsoever, it made no difference what.

In all the mining legislation of Mexico and of Spanish America, with the exception of one temporary act, where the mining legislation touched at all upon nonmetalliferous minerals, in all, with one exception, it was affirmatively stated since 1821 that the nonmetalliferous minerals went with the land. There was one piece of legislation, the Aranzgua laws, which provided that coal rights upon the public lands might be issued by the Government similar to the metalliferous mineral rights. Now, recently, listening to just such wild statements as have been made in some of the reports to which the Senator has reference, in the last few years through the investment of foreign capital in Mexico—this is where the question has grown acute, through the investment of foreign capital—first, Lord Cowdray, Sir Weetman Pearson, a member of the firm of F. Pearson & Son, going into partnership with certain Mexicans, and next following Doheny, of the Mexican Petroleum Co., and Americans going into Tampico and buying private lands, the titles to which run back 200 years, obtained from the Spanish Government with no reservations except read into them by the law a reservation of the metalliferous mineral rights, the Mexican Government has attempted to estop them from developing the nonmetalliferous minerals, although the last act of the constitutional government upon that subject, issued in 1910, passed by the Congress in the last year of the old Diaz administration, distinctly provided again that all nonmetalliferous products belonged to the owner of the soil.

Now, despite this history of 600 years' legislation, first in Spain in 1375, and down to the year 1910, the present so-called Government of Mexico has sought to set aside what? No one questions the right of the Mexican Government to pass exactly such a law as we are passing, and to reserve to Mexico in the future the nonmetalliferous minerals in her public lands. No one questions that right. That is a right of sovereignty. That is what we are doing here now. Our complaint of Mexico is that instead of confining her legislation to that, this clause of the constitution which the Senator rolled under his tongue is a confiscatory clause, allowing them to go back and to take away from all of the private individuals the lands the titles to which they have had for 200 years or more; and this Government has said: "You shall not do it."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator knows better than I do what the conditions are down there, but I think this is an opportune time to suggest to the Senator that all of the oil ownerships in Mexico which are imperiled by article 27 were not secured by foreigners from the Government of Mexico, but by purchase from private owners, whose titles, as the Senator has well said, are some of them centuries old.

Mr. FALL. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to suggest——

Mr. FALL. Just one moment. Let me give a statement roughly as to the area. In the oil fields which are being developed in Mexico are included something like 500,000 hectares—a hectare being 2.47 acres—something like 500,000 hectares, owned outright in fee by Americans who are developing it. In the same area Americans own something like 2,000,000 hectares of leased lands, not one hectare being either owned by or lease obtained from the Mexican Government, but entirely from private owners.

I now yield to the Senator.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I only wanted to suggest that I neither commend nor condemn the policies of the other nations, and I only cited the policies of England and Japan and Argentina and Mexico to show that they had an idea that the Government itself would need these oils, and that our Government might need our oil.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, when we achieved our independence we broke away from the Government of England. The King of England owns all the Crown minerals.

Mr SMITH of Arizona. He always has.

Mr. FALL. He always has. The citizens own none, and the only possible method by which a citizen could acquire a development for the benefit of the public of any of the Crown metals under the English law was to secure from the English King, through his ministers, or from the English Government, representing the King, the right to go upon the lands and exploit them for the benefit of the metalliferous minerals. But we broke away from that, and we said when you take 160 acres of land here in the United States, which we give to you for your home, you take that land to the sky above and to the molten mass beneath the soil.

Now, for the first time since 1836, we are asked to change that system. At that time we adopted the leasing system applicable in Illinois, and then in Missouri being opened up, because the Government of the United States needed lead for bullets and as a war measure, we adopted a leasing system on the lead mines. But after a 10-year fight the present system was adopted not only of giving the lands in fee, but when you got title to your lands you took title to all under them, allowing a man to acquire mineral rights upon the public domain in fee.

Now we are changing. Now we are going, in so far as Government lands are concerned, to the old civil-law system, to the old Spanish system, to the old Crown system of Great Britain, and that is the objection which I have as an American citizen to the system. But we had better unloose the natural resources of this country, which have made it great, which have made it to-day the one country of the world the adhesion of which to the proposed league of nations is absolutely essential. The old incentive, the old American individual system, is what has made this country great. Recently we have found order after order coming from the departments of the Government segregating 5,000,000 acres of land in my State of New Mexico in coal areas. People are freezing for want of coal and 191,000,000,000 tons of coal are reserved from use in my State alone by your paternal Government. We can not use it even locally for our own needs. If you undertake to dig a well as a prospector in the hope that you may find oil, a Government blanket reservation is placed over you and you can not get that oil. That is what happened in Wyoming and in other States of the Northwest. If you undertake to develop phosphates for your local consumption and you discover phosphate rock, which in Tennessee would be worth $4.57 a ton, you can not use it in New Mexico or the public-land States, because a reservation comes from a bureau in Washington and closes you down. Those are the conditions under which we are laboring.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to his colleague?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I simply want to add to what my colleague has said a little incident which I am informed occurred in the State of Utah. The governor of that State informed me that when a President of the United States was visiting Utah they were very anxious to show him all their resources and what a great State they had the prospect of making out of Utah, and among other things they took him out in a section of the country where they were drilling for oil with the possibility and probability of finding oil in that locality; and the President wired to have all that section of country withdrawn.

Mr. FALL. Precisely.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me, I am not certain about it, but I got it fairly straight, in a certain part of my State prospectors, ready to risk all they had on it, started out to find oil. They went to digging a well, and a Government expert came along and finding out that these crazy prospectors had made a strike of a little oil in that country, immediately withdrew that whole section from exploitation and made a Government reservation of oil that nobody had yet seen. Derricks were pulled up and the men went home, and the Government is conserving that oil now, wherever it is. That is the principle that we have been trying to get from under.

Mr. FALL. I thank my colleague for bearing me out in this matter. It is one of very great importance to us. It is a situation that we feel very deeply. We may express impatience at times when other Senators, who do not realize conditions, are so insistent upon having the Government retain resources within the confines of other States when they have already used their own. We are somewhat peeved at times when we realize that the great State of Arkansas was purely a public-land State, that all the mines in it and all the rich land in it and all the great timber in it belonged to the people of the United States, that the Government had a sovereign right to say that no one should acquire a home in the State of Arkansas and that no one should acquire a mine in the State of Arkansas, but we are proud of the fact that those who represented the people of the United States generally and had the interests of the people generally at heart adopted a different theory and said to all the people all over the United States, "Go out there into the State of Arkansas and on the other public domain wherever you may find it and carve out a home to support your family, make yourself an American citizen, and send your Senators from Arkansas to help represent that State and help represent the other States of the Union."

The public domain is now fast disappearing. Recently oil discoveries such as the Senator has mentioned, where a well would flow possibly 30,000 barrels a day and make people rich in a week, have been made. I may say to the Senator that after some rather extensive experience in mining for 35 years, with reference to oil, as I can say with reference to the metalliferous mining, for every mine or every well which has been a success there have been from 20 to 1,000 failures, in which the people in good faith have put their money and their friends' money.

Oil wells do not spout from the ground. There is no man in the United States who has yet possessed Moses' staff when it comes to discovering underground wells. It has only been brought out by American initiative and American energy and American industry, and we possess that in most remarkable degree as individuals, more than such characteristics are exhibited by the people of any other nation on earth as individuals. Collectively as a Government in business matters we are and always have been and always will be a failure. You can not run business by politics, and in a two years' replacement of a Congress of the United States you can not conduct business matters as business matters should be conducted. We are a failure collectively in business matters; individually we are the greatest people on the face of the earth in all commercial and industrial matters.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN obtained the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask the Senator to yield to me that I may offer several amendments to the pending bill. I ask that they may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN'S OFFICE.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I hesitate to take the time of the Senate at this late hour to discuss a subject which is entirely foreign to the oil question, but inasmuch as the question of alien property has been brought up in the discussion and has a very important bearing on a resolution introduced by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], requesting the Senate to order an investigation of the Alien Property Custodian's affairs, I desire to submit a few remarks to the Senate at this time. I do so because I shall be engaged to-morrow in committee work and it will be impossible for me at any later date to place on the record certain information which has been procured for me and has been developed by the recent inquiry made by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate in regard to Mr. Palmer.

I simply wish to say that all I shall refer to in those hearings has been and is a matter of public record. The hearings were printed upon the order of the chairman of the committee, and I feel, in order that the Senate may have a full appreciation of the importance of this resolution, that it will be necessary for me to refer to those hearings.

The resolution (S. Res. 172) provides for an investigation of the administration of the Alien Property Custodian's office. Mr. Palmer, as Alien Property Custodian, has administered, I think, several thousand trusts. He has had placed in his custody, estimated, nearly $700,000,000. There are many property owners in this country and many citizens who are complaining of the policy of that department, and it seems to me that we will be derelict in our public duty if we do not ascertain how that fund has been administered.

Mr. Palmer takes the following position in a report made to the Senate, a report which in no way gives any financial information as to how his office has been administered, or how, in the event of this country desiring to balance those funds against the claims that we have against Germany, that may be done. There is nothing but pure conjecture on the part of anyone who tries to estimate how much money Mr. Palmer has in his possession as custodian. Mr. Palmer takes this position in his report:

When the Congress passed the amendment giving to the Alien Property Custodian the general power of sale, it was with the purpose in mind that the German industrial army on American soil should be captured and destroyed. I have proceeded with all expedition possible to this end. Instead of permitting myself to become a mere conservator of enemy property I have tried to make the trading-with-the-enemy act a fighting force in the war.

But was that Mr. Palmer's position previous to the war, and has it been his position during his administration of the Alien Property Custodian's department? I refer now to the record of the hearings.

This relates in the end to Mr. Palmer's policy in regard to our transactions with Germany. On page 4 of the record is set forth an editorial from an issue of the New York World of February 28, 1919. The editorial is as follows——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I inquire whether the matter of which the Senator is speaking is not executive in character?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator make that inquiry of me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I make it of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The confirmation of the nomination of the Attorney General by the advice and consent of the Senate is an executive matter.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator was referring to testimony taken in a hearing on that matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not know what the Senator from New Jersey was referring to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am referring to the business policy of Mr. Palmer previous to the war, and I am quoting from the public hearings held before a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee. Those hearings are a matter of public record and I am simply quoting from them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield further?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes; I yield further.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I inquire whether the hearings have been made public?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The hearings have been made public and I am reading from the printed record.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am speaking of the action of the Senate. Has the Senate made the hearings public?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hold in my hand a copy of the hearings published and freely circulated and placed in the hands of many of the Senators and mailed through the country.

Mr. LODGE. They are not marked confidential.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely rise to call attention to the fact that the Senator now refers in the course of his discussion to testimony taken before a committee to which was referred the question of the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Palmer. So far as I have been advised no resolution of the Senate has ever been passed removing the seal of secrecy from the proceedings in connection with the nomination, and accordingly I think it is a violation of the rules to refer to the testimony.

Mr. LODGE. Under what rule are the printed hearings of a committee secret?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not familiar with the rule to which the Senator from Montana refers.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of course, if the Senate sustains the objection of the Senator from Montana I presume I can not proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana has made no objection.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will therefore proceed, Mr. President.

On page 4 of the record there is set forth an editorial from the issue of the New York World of February 28, 1919. The editorial is as follows:

WHO WAS "M. P."?

The nomination of A. Mitchell Palmer, of Pennsylvania, to be Attorney General of the United States raises again a question which came up in the summer of 1915, and which was not satisfactorily answered then, nor has it been answered since. This is the question of who was the "M. P." mysteriously referred to in the Albert papers, published in the World at that time, as a confidential reporter professing to place the German foreign office in communication with the innermost thought and purposes of the President and State Department in the Lusitania controversy.

Dr. Albert's secret papers represented "M. P." as "unmistakably a man of great influence, enjoying easy access to the President of the United States and to the Secretary of State." It is further recorded, under date of July 23, that this "M. P." had imparted to German agents here certain conclusions from talks with the President. These conclusions were to the effect that if a satisfactory reply came from Berlin to the American Lusitania note of July 21, the protest to England would be crowded "to the uttermost" and that the President "hardly hoped for a positive statement that the submarine warfare would be discontinued." The World at the same time published the White House calling list for the only days around that time when the President was in Washington. The list showed that one of the callers on July 22 was A. Mitchell Palmer.

Mr. Palmer admitted that he had talked with the President on that day immediately following and preceding the days, respectively, of the Lusitania note and the Albert memorandum, but denied that the conversation had anything to do with matters as stated by Dr. Albert.

The identity of "M. P." thus remains undetermined. But the mystery should be cleared up. Mr. Palmer himself should insist upon it in advance of his confirmation by the Senate. It is a small matter as between himself and others mentioned who shall be the next Attorney General. It is a great matter that the American people should know positively that "M. P." is not the next Attorney General of the United States. Who was "M. P."?

At page 7 of the record Senator WALSH of Montana said:

He—

freely admits that he is undoubtedly the gentleman referred to as "M. P.," because it connects up exactly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I call the attention of the Chair to subdivision 2 of Rule XXXVIII, which is as follows:

2. All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations, concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon any nomination, shall be kept secret.

I inquire whether the Senator from New Jersey is not in violation of that rule in referring to the remarks made by another Senator in connection with the consideration of a nomination?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I was simply quoting from the record of the committee, as I was quoting previously from the record the remarks found on page 7. I simply did that in order that I might continue still quoting from the record. I am quoting entirely from the record and it is found there, and those hearings were public.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will perfectly understand that I am not impugning the accuracy of his quotation. I am inquiring whether he is not violating the plain language of the rule?

Mr. LODGE. What rule, Mr. President, if I may ask?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I just called the attention of the Chair to the rule.

Mr. LODGE. I was out of the Senate Chamber for a moment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I refer the Senator from Massachusetts to subdivision 2 of Rule XXXVIII, which reads:

All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations.

The Senator having the floor has just quoted remarks made by a Senator when a nomination was under consideration.

Mr. LODGE. Not when it was under consideration in executive session of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the rule does not say that; it says "all * * * remarks."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey is quoting from the printed report of a hearing, which has been published in the newspapers, a hearing at which newspaper reporters were present. There is no more secrecy about it than there would have been had it been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator can not wipe the rule out by any comment of that character.

Mr. LODGE. The rule does not apply to what was said in committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If some one violates the rules of the Senate and proceedings of an executive session are published in a newspaper, a Senator equally violates the rule when he reads from that report.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, if he has violated the rule; but my contention is that the Senator from New Jersey has not violated the rule.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not speaking about his having violated the rule at all. A Senator finds a report in a newspaper of what transpired in an executive session. It is entirely immaterial that he reads from that report. He has no right to make any comment at all upon any remarks made by any Senator. That is what the rule means.

Mr. LODGE. The rule does not touch it at all. The rule says:

All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The committee was acting upon a nomination.

Mr. LODGE. The committee was merely taking testimony.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, well; all right, if the Senator thinks that is a good distinction. I submit it to the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. And it was published to the world.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I submit the matter to the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Will the Senator from Montana be kind enough to state again the point of order?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The point of order I am making is that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] in the course of his remarks quoted from hearings had before a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, which was considering the nomination of Mr. Palmer. He read what purported to be remarks made by one Member of the Senate while the hearing was in progress. I inquire of the Chair whether the Senator is not in violation of subdivision 2 of Rule XXXVIII, which reads as follows?—

2. All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations, concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon any nomination, shall be kept secret.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I desire to inform the Chair that these hearings were public, that they had been released from secrecy, and that the remarks published on page 7 were quoted as an assertion by the Senator during the hearings and while the questioning was going on. I was simply quoting the hearings, as I am quoting the text of the memorandum which was filed in the hearings.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the rule refers to executive session proceedings on nominations, and the paragraph referred to relates to information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations. A nomination may be acted upon only in executive session. The committee's work is purely advisory. The committee took testimony which was open to the public; they have printed it; it has been in public circulation; there is no stamp of "confidential" upon it. It seems to be clear, therefore, that the second paragraph of this rule does not reach the question at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to submit simply that a committee discharging duties of that character is merely acting as an agency of the Senate, and the testimony taken before the committee is in exactly the same situation as though the committee were sitting in executive session to consider a nomination. The Senate takes that method of informing itself concerning the subject matter simply because it is convenient to it to do so. The seal of secrecy enjoined by the rule is just as plain and obvious with respect to the remarks made before the committee having the executive matter under consideration as though they were made before the Senate sitting in executive session.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask the Senator from Montana, if the ban of secrecy was on these hearings, why the committee voted that the hearings should be made public?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, there is not any question about the matter at all. The committee gave the press what transpired. Whether they were justified in doing so or not is not open to discussion now. They did it; they did print these hearings. I should not like to be understood, and nobody can understand me, as justifying any other position with respect to the matter. I should not like to have it understood that I even want to intimate to the contrary. The committee did it, but the rule is that the nomination was subject to discussion only in executive session. Of course, if this can go on, every ban of secrecy now is removed from this nomination. Obviously those who are supporting the report of the committee upon this nomination will have an opportunity to reply to the Senator from New Jersey.

Is it possible, Mr. President, that a committee of the Senate can control the Senate in respect to the secret character of its executive proceedings?

Can the Committee on Foreign Relations, for instance, make public the subject of a treaty under consideration by the committee and the testimony taken in connection with the hearing so as to open up the whole subject as to whether the treaty should be ratified or not, and thus force the subject to become open to public discussion in open session in the Senate? Is that the position taken by the Senator from Massachusetts? Is that the position taken by the Senator from New Jersey? If so, the creature controls the creator.

The committees are the agencies of the Senate; they can not make these proceedings public; they can not transform what the rules declare to be executive in character into matters of open discussion. If the Senator from New Jersey goes on, of course some of the rest of us shall want to follow him, and thus the whole subject becomes one for open debate without any action by the Senate at all.

Some time ago the Senate ordered that all hearings upon the general treaty with Germany be public and that discussion be public. That was done in advance, and as my recollection is, upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts. No action of that kind has been taken with reference to this matter. How, then, can it become the subject of open discussion here in the Senate?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I should like to inform the Chair that I am discussing the subject matter contained in the resolution of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], ordering an investigation into the activities of the Alien Property Custodian. The Alien Property Custodian happened to be Mr. Palmer, who has been nominated for Attorney General, and in the course of the hearings to which I have referred certain information relating to his administration of the Alien Property Custodian's office and his attitude in regard to property was brought out. Those hearings have been made public; Mr. Palmer has acted upon them in the great publicity bureau which I understand he carries on; he has referred to the testimony himself while he was under consideration by the Senate; and am I not within my right as the Senator from New Jersey when I protest against these policies of his? Have I myself not the opportunity of referring to the public hearings when Mr. Palmer can make statements in the public press. I am talking to the resolution of the Senator from New York, and I wish to present to the Senate Mr. Palmer's views regarding property rights so far as they relate to our foreign relations. I am leading up to that.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course there is not any question that if the Senator from New Jersey is discussing the nomination of Mr. Palmer to be Attorney General he is out of order. That can only be done in executive session. I was not here when he began, but as I understand from what has been said he is discussing a resolution to investigate the office of the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. One moment. In discussing that, which he has a right to discuss in open session, he quotes from hearings held by a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee in regard to Mr. Palmer's fitness to be Attorney General. If anybody has broken a rule it is that subcommittee. I do not charge them with having broken the rule at all. They made those hearings public, and they were made public in every possible way. I saw long extracts from the hearings in the press. They were not stamped "confidential," and there is nothing in the rules which makes the report of a public hearing confidential. What makes a subject confidential and secret is its relation to a nomination; and, I repeat, that if the Senator from New Jersey is discussing a nomination I agree that he is out of order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I further yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am very glad to have that concession of the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not understand that the resolution of the Senator from New York is now before the Senate for discussion. The matter before the Senate for discussion, as I understand, is the oil leasing bill. So that the Senator from New Jersey can not be speaking to the resolution of the Senator from New York. He is not entitled to speak to the resolution of the Senator from New York. Therefore his remarks must be construed in connection with any subject to which they are relevant; and he has quoted from the testimony taken on the matter of the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Palmer.

Whatever he is talking about, he is, as a matter of course, discussing the testimony which was taken touching the appropriateness of the confirmation of Mr. Palmer, which, of course, will give anybody an opportunity to talk upon the other side of that question and refer to the testimony that in any way contradicts or contraverts the conclusions the Senator from New Jersey would like to have drawn from the testimony to which he alludes. So that the whole matter of the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Palmer is before the Senate and can not be excluded if this proceeding continues.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, the situation is that the second paragraph of Rule XXXVIII provides:

All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations, concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon any nomination, shall be kept secret.

That rule is headed "Executive session—Proceedings on nominations," and it can fairly be construed as applying only to proceedings of the Senate in executive session when acting upon nominations. It has no application to proceedings in open session or to legislative business. The Chair, therefore, is constrained to rule that, in his opinion, the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, at page 167 Mr. Palmer testified:

When the Albert papers were published by the New York World the New York World printed what was alleged to be a memorandum found amongst the Albert papers in which reference was made to the visit to the White House of one "M. P." I had never heard of Albert; I did not know there was such a person living at that time, and of course I was amazed to find this memorandum with a reference to "M. P." and a garbled, exaggerated, and entirely different statement of what I had told Mr. Stanchfield.

The New York World telegraphed me, I think, and asked me for an explanation. I made this statement, which is printed in your headings and which, as I recall, is about what I said:

"The story published in the World this morning, which implies, though it does not say I am the mysterious "M. P." referred to in somebody's report of an alleged conversation with the President, is all a fairy tale as far as I am concerned. I never had any such conversation with the President and never reported any such conversation to anybody, anywhere, at any time. I never saw this Dr. Albert, whose private memoranda are presumably being published by the World, and I never heard of him until these articles began appearing. I never had any communication of any kind or any character with him.

"I did see the President on July 22, and I talked to him about two things. I tendered my declination of the office of judge of the Court of Claims, to which the President had appointed me sometime before. The other matter about which I spoke to him was at the request of John B. Stanchfield, a leading member of the New York bar and a personal friend of mine. He had requested me to convey certain information to the President which had come into his possession. This had to do with the formation of a steamship line by certain prominent American citizens residing in New York whom Mr. Stanchfield represented. The line was to carry noncontraband to neutral ports in Europe. My conversation with the President was with regard to the attitude of the Government with respect to neutral commerce to such ports and had nothing to do with the various matters printed in the World. Neither the President nor I said anything which could be twisted into the kind of statements which the World has printed this morning. I reported to Mr. Stanchfield concerning my talk with the President, and that was the end of it."

Now, that is correct, as I recall it.

At page 166 he testified:

As Senator OVERMAN has said, this same matter was adverted to in the hearings before the full Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate at the time my nomination for Attorney General was before the Senate during the last Congress. At that time I made a statement of the facts, and the committee, I think, immediately afterwards unanimously voted to confirm my nomination. The whole story is this:

Some time in the summer of 1915 Mr. John B. Stanchfield, of New York, an old personal and professional friend of mine, told me that he was either interested in or concerned for some people, all American citizens, who were anxious to engage in the business of international trade with the idea of forming a company to engage in shipping between this country and neutral ports, and that before that venture was actually carried out they wondered if they could get some unofficial expression of the policy and purpose of the Government with respect to interference with that kind of trade—whether the Government proposed to make representations to Great Britain against interference by Great Britain with neutral trade. He did not tell me whom he represented; I never knew and do not know now.

Some time after that I called on the President on an entirely different matter; called on him, indeed, to resign my commission as judge of the Court of Claims. At that interview I told the President what Mr. Stanchfield had said to me, and he replied that he was perfectly willing to say what he had already said publicly, that this country had made or would make—I have forgotten which—representations to Great Britain in reference to their interference with neutral trade, and that he had no earthly objection to my saying that.

The next time I saw Mr. Stanchfield I told him what the President had authorized me to say. There was not anything in it that the President had not already said; it was generally known. That was the end of it, except that some little time after that—I have forgotten how long—Mr. Levy, who is Mr. Stanchfield's law partner, came out to my home in Pennsylvania one day, and he was accompanied by Mr. Simon. Whether I saw Mr. Simon or not, I am not sure, but I knew he was there; Mr. Levy told me so. It did not mean anything to me, because he was represented as an American citizen; I had never heard of him before and did not know his relation to the matter. Mr. Levy, or the two of them—I have forgotten which—asked me to do something else in relation to this matter, I think to find out if they could make some communications with some foreign countries through the State Department. Whatever it was I did not do it.

The Albert memorandum apparently relates to the interview which Mr. Palmer admits that he had with Mr. Levy, Mr. Stanchfield's law partner, and with Mr. Simon, and the observation may be made that Mr. Palmer said this interview took place at his home in Pennsylvania.

I will now read from the record, page 261:

Senator DILLINGHAM. I desire at this time to place in the record a copy of a memorandum found in the dispatch bag lost by Dr. Albert and mentioned by Senator FRELINGHUYSEN in connection with the publication in the New York World regarding an interview had by Mr. Palmer with the President. This has been furnished to me by the State Department, and is a translation of the original document, which was in German. I am informed by the State Department that no other paper relating to Gen. Palmer was found in the papers taken.

The memorandum referred to is here printed in full, as follows:

[Translation.]

NEW YORK, July 23, 1915.

CONVERSATION WITH LEGAL AGENT LEVY AND MR. JOHN SIMON.

Levy advises regarding a conference with M. P. Thereafter M. P. saw Lansing as well as Wilson. He informed both of them that an American syndicate had approached him which had strong German relations. This syndicate wishes to buy up cotton for Germany in great style, thereby to relieve the cotton situation and at the same time to provide Germany with cotton. The relations of the American syndicate to Germany are very strong, so that they might even possibly be able to influence the position of Germany in the general political question. P. M. therefore asked for a candid confidential statement, in order to make clear not only his own position but also necessarily the political opportunity. The result of the conversation was as follows:

1. The note of protest to England will go in any event, whether Germany answers satisfactorily or not.

2. Should it be possible to settle satisfactorily the Lusitania case, the President would bind himself to carry the protest against England through to the uttermost.

3. The continuance of the difference with Germany over the Lusitania case is "embarrassing" for the President in carrying out the protest against England. He will not create the impression that the note to Germany and the protest to England are a "bargain," for he has undisputed American rights to uphold.

4. A contemplated English proposal to buy cotton in great style and invest the proceeds in America would not satisfy the President as an answer to the protest, because that refers to the violation of American rights and not only to a question of money. (N. B.—M. P. believes that it will be possible to bring this plan to the front with the assistance of southern Senators.)

5. The President, in order to ascertain from Mr. M. P. how strong the German influence of his syndicate is, would like to have trend of German note before the note is officially sent, and declares himself ready before the answer is drafted to discuss it with M. P., and eventually to so influence it that there will be an agreement for its reception and also to be ready to influence the press through a wink.

6. As far as the note itself is concerned, which he awaits, so he awaits another expression of regret, which was not followed in the last note. Regret together with the statement that nobody had expected that human lives would be lost and that the ship would sink so quickly.

The President is said to have openly declared that he could hardly hope for a positive statement that the submarine warfare would be discontinued. Germany should only, out of consideration for friendly America, declare herself to be prepared to discuss with the United States and to work together with her to make impossible the destruction of American lives. Germany shall declare herself ready to make the strongest efforts to reach this goal, but to expect that America will work with her in this respect. The President is of the opinion that Americans who in the present situation take passage on a munitions-laden ship "take their lives into their own hands." The President seems to expect that we ourselves shall set forth an agreement in the matter, possibly leaving out the principle and fall back upon the above-mentioned mutual endeavors.

The foregoing information sounds almost unbelievable. If it is correct, the President has not understood the German note at all, and, on the other hand, does not know what he says in his note. The diplomatic expressions and the meaning of a "deliberately unfriendly act" do not seem to be clear to him.

M. P. again emphasized how very much the President was upset and disturbed about the matter, how much he wishes to come out of the matter, how he emphasized that the note to England had been ready when the Lusitania case came up, and how he held out to M. P. that if he could clear up this matter how very much obliged to him he would be.

If the plan is to be carried through, he promises beforehand telegraphic connections with Germany.

I can hardly believe that the southern Senators have given full consideration to the statement made about them in the Albert memorandum, a statement substantially to the effect that they might barter American rights for cotton.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, what was the date of that transaction?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. July 28, 1915.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Of course at that time, then, they had the right to ship cotton to Germany through neutral ports.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But the Senator will understand that it was an agreement that the blockade should be made by England against German ports, and that was the bargain which was supposed to be made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. England could not legally blockade a neutral port. England's blockade of Rotterdam was utterly in defiance of international law and had been protested by our Government, and cotton had the right to go through Rotterdam to Germany during the whole of 1915. I know nothing about Mr. Palmer's connection with it, but I announce here, and I defy anyone to contradict the proposition, that by every rule of international law at that time cotton had the right to go through Rotterdam to Germany, and the action of Great Britain in stopping it was in violation of the decisions of her own courts.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. To show that my construction of the memorandum is not far-fetched, I will again read paragraph 4:

4. A contemplated English proposal to buy cotton in great style and invest the proceeds in America would not satisfy the President as an answer to the protest, because that refers to the violation of American rights and not only to a question of money. (N. B.—M. P. believes that it will be possible to bring this plan to the front with the assistance of southern Senators.)

Perhaps some of you do not believe the report set forth in the Albert memorandum of the interview between Mr. Palmer and Messrs. Levy and Simon. The memorandum, however, evidently was made about the time of the interview and when same was fresh in the minds of Messrs. Levy and Simon. Legal agent Levy is an able New York lawyer. When we recall the Lusitania incident and the subsequent acts of the administration—that is to say, when we read the report in the light of history on its face it seems probable and moreover the question naturally rises, What motive would Messrs. Levy and Simon have had to make a false report? The situation was such as to call for very accurate information from them in regard to the attitude of the administration.

I will again read the last paragraph of the editorial of February 28, 1919, from the administration paper, the New York World:

The identity of "M. P." thus remains undetermined. But the mystery should be cleared up. Mr. Palmer himself should insist upon it in advance of his confirmation by the Senate. It is a small matter as between himself and others mentioned who shall be the next Attorney General. It is a great matter that the American people should know positively that "M. P." is not the next Attorney General of the United States. Who was "M. P."?

We now know that "M. P." is Mr. Palmer. Was the New York World wrong when it said:

It is a great matter that the American people should know positively that "M. P." is not the next Attorney General of the United States.

That the interview between Mr. Palmer and Messrs. Levy and Simon was correctly set forth in the Albert memorandum seems still more probable when we recall Mr. Palmer's published views about the Lusitania catastrophe. I had thought that such views were set forth in the record. However, as they were published in the New York Times, a paper rivaling the World in administration support, I think that we can accept them as stated.

I read an extract from the New York Times of May 9, 1915:

Response to telegraphic request for expression of opinion as to what America's duty should be on the sinking of the Lusitania.

STROUDSBURG, PA., May 8.

The loss of American lives on the Lusitania is a matter of grave concern to our people, but it does not under the circumstances call for immediate drastic action on the part of the United States. It certainly should not embroil us in this foreign war. The Lusitania was flying the British flag and carrying munitions of war for the support of a belligerent. Neutral passengers who in the face of warning undertook this perilous voyage certainly assumed some risk themselves for which the entire Nation should not be asked to suffer. Of course, the destruction of a passenger boat is horrible. War is always horrible. This method of fighting is not humane. It is hardly civilized, but there is no such thing as humanity in civilized warfare. Our people may have the greatest confidence that our President will deal with this serious situation with a wise forbearance which will make for peace without sacrifice of us or of our real rights.

My views about the sinking of the Lusitania were very emphatically stated, and my views, as well as the views of the majority of the Senators, were well known in regard to the attitude of those who, like Mr. Palmer, contended that "neutral passengers who in the face of warning undertook this perilous voyage certainly assumed some risk themselves for which the entire Nation should not be asked to suffer." The attitude of the administration and of men like Mr. Palmer was painful and forms a most distressing and I may say nauseating chapter in our history.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am not a member of the Judiciary Committee, and, of course, am not advised as to what that committee has done regarding the appointment of Mr. Palmer, but I should like to inquire if that committee has concluded the investigation of the matters to which the Senator from New Jersey is now referring?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will simply say in reply to that that one Senator, when I asked him if he had read that very important translation of the Albert note, said to me that he had not. I think the inquiry should be directed to the acting chairman of the committee, or whoever has made the report on Mr. Palmer. I understand that Mr. Palmer's nomination has been reported to the Senate, with a written report favorable to his confirmation. I understand that that is the situation, if that is the information that the Senator wishes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Am I to understand, then, that that committee has considered the various matters which the Senator from New Jersey is now discussing and has decided that they do not reflect upon the character of Mr. Palmer?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I hardly understand that that is the situation or that that is the question. It is not upon Mr. Palmer's confirmation at all that the Senator is speaking at the present time. The Senator's remarks are upon a resolution introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] relative, as I understand, to the investigation to be had, or asked for, of the Alien Enemy Property Custodian's office as a whole.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STERLING. He is quoting from the record made by the subcommittee.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have been sitting here casually listening to the speech of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and, of course, this is a subject about which I have no special information. In fact, I have only heard very limited rumors regarding what is going on, but it has been my understanding that the Committee on the Judiciary have taken all the testimony to which the Senator from New Jersey now refers, that it has considered the testimony which the Senator is now quoting, together with other testimony, and that upon the whole testimony the committee have decided that there is nothing in the record to reflect upon the character of Mr. Palmer, and have made a report recommending his confirmation as Attorney General. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he has information as to what the vote of the committee was upon that report?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am perfectly willing to answer the Senator's question. I think I did so when I said it was a favorable report and was unanimous. Testimony has been taken. I am now referring to certain portions in connection with Mr. CALDER's resolution.

I will say in passing, however, that I understand no witnesses were subpœnaed; and I understand, so far as the facts presented are concerned, the committee made a report in which they say charges were not warranted and they completely approved of Mr. Palmer's confirmation. I am speaking to the resolution to investigate the Alien Property Custodian and referring to the hearings had by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. May I not ask the Senator from New Jersey if he was not active in trying to get before the Committee on the Judiciary all the facts and suspicions which he had in mind or knew anything about in connection with Mr. Palmer's dealings?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, I was; and I failed because in that connection certain men who appeared before the committee asking that subpœnas be issued were denied the opportunity to prove their facts by reason of the fact that they could not get a subpœna for the witnesses. I am not criticizing the committee. I am simply stating it as a fact, because I believe there was some question as to whether the committee were empowered to broaden the scope of their inquiry to that extent. I am simply referring to it because I believe if they had called the witnesses and followed up the statements that were made by certain gentlemen appearing before the committee they could have elicited considerable more information than they did.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. May I ask the Senator from New Jersey if he wants the Senate to understand that the Committee on the Judiciary made a report ignoring testimony which was proffered to it and deliberately refusing to go into it?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSFN. I do not want the Senator to understand anything. I am talking upon another subject.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But I am asking if the Senator does want the Senate to understand that?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think that a full investigation should be made of the Alien Property Custodian's acts, of every transaction that he has made, that a searching inquiry should be made, and an audit as to how he handled the vast funds in his possession. I think witnesses should be called, and I think a thorough inquiry should be made, and that is what I am talking about.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not want to be discourteous to the Senator from Montana, but I will finish my remarks in a few moments.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely desire to make a single remark. Up to the present time the Senator does not seem to have spoken very much about Mr. Palmer's administration of the office of Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am coming to that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. His discussion thus far has seemed to relate to some other matters.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, just a word. I want to clear up a little the inquiry made by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES].

My understanding is that the subcommittee of which the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] was chairman had the case under consideration for two months or more. Senator DILLINGHAM finally reported to the full committee in favor of Mr. Palmer's confirmation and the report was unanimous. The full committee adopted the report of the subcommittee and instructed the chairman to report the nomination favorably. That is the status of the case before the Senate, and that nomination has been reported and is on the calendar. I understand it was confirmed one day when I was not here, and that that action was rescinded and it was again placed upon the calendar. As I understand it, the nomination is on the calendar as reported from the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Minnesota permit the Chair to ask a question? The Chair is a member of the committee and wishes to ask the Senator from Minnesota if, as a matter of fact, there were any formal charges filed before the subcommittee against Mr. Palmer?

Mr. NELSON. There were charges filed, as I recall, in the first instance, or made orally before the committee by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. In view of those charges he appeared before the committee in the early part of the session and made formal charges in person, and, I think, submitted some documents. In view of that fact, there being opposition to his confirmation and charges made, a subcommittee was appointed.

Mr. STERLING. Permit me to correct the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] in regard to the charges. No formal charges were filed with the subcommittee. Some documents were submitted and a statement made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], but no formal charges were made.

Mr. NELSON. In view of the representations made by the Senator from New Jersey before the committee in respect to the nomination, a subcommittee was appointed to take testimony and hear what objections there were to the confirmation of Mr. Palmer. That subcommittee labored diligently for over two months and finally reported to the committee unanimously in favor of the confirmation, and the full committee adopted that report. The nomination has been reported to the Senate and is pending to-day on the calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota mentioned the fact that the confirmation was had and then withdrawn. It was informally had by mistake, without discussion.

Mr. NELSON. I was not present at the time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was just passed informally. As no one meant that it should be passed in that way, it was changed the next day.

Mr. NELSON. But it is still pending on the calendar?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. STERLING. I can easily explain how that happened. I made many reports from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, involving appointments of postmasters in half a dozen different States, and inadvertently the nomination paper in the Attorney General's case got among those papers and was passed up to the Secretary's desk.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There was no desire on the part of anyone——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I must decline to yield further.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one more word.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. All right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There was no desire upon the part of anyone to pass the nomination without giving anyone who desired to criticize it the fullest opportunity, and it was unanimously corrected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will finish, I hope, very shortly if I am not interrupted further. I will not enter into a question of the hearings, because that relates to the nomination of Mr. Palmer.

As the question was asked me directly, I feel that witnesses should have been called. I am not criticizing the committee for that, because I hope that the resolution I am talking to will be passed and a full investigation ordered.

I want to refer just briefly to Mr. Palmer as Alien Property Custodian. That Mr. Palmer as Alien Property Custodian favored political friends in his appointments to enemy corporations is known to all of you. In my own State it was evident that the majority of these selected were selected because of their political affiliations. While such fact alone would not disqualify him, still there is one phase of his administration as Alien Property Custodian to which I desire to direct your particular attention.

From my study of the treaty with Germany I am convinced that it sets forth many and very serious liabilities for the United States, and that the only tangible asset which we are likely to have to meet our losses and those of our citizens will be the fund realized from the sale by the Alien Property Custodian of property belonging to Germans. I had always supposed that the fund would be kept for that very purpose, and always believed that it was to our interest to realize as much as possible from German property. What was, and apparently still is, Mr. Palmer's view is set forth at page 126 of the record. I read therefrom:

> I was willing to give them (Germans) a fair chance, give them an open sale, let everybody come and buy, but I was not going to hunt around to find the best time to place millions in the United States Treasury for these Germans to hire lawyers in America to come and fight for after the war was over.

That was his answer to the claim that property such as the Bosch Magneto Co. and International Insurance Co. had been sacrificed. Where did Mr. Palmer ever gain the notion that as Alien Property Custodian he was seizing property to be subsequently turned over to Germans? Perhaps he was one of those who believed that no matter what sacrifice we might make, we should not under any circumstances ask for any reimbursement for ourselves or for the losses of our citizens, and should even turn over to Germany the proceeds of all property which he might have seized. I repeat, so far as I can see, the only property we will have to meet our losses and those of our citizens is the Alien Property Custodian's fund, and if it does not prove large enough, and we know well that it will not, I ask you: Is Mr. Palmer to be praised or blamed? From his testimony, as well as from certain provisions inserted in the treaty apparently at the suggestion of Mr. Bradley Palmer, one of the counsel for the Alien Property Custodian, but, who, I believe, is in no way related to him, Mr. Palmer feared that the United States would be called upon to account. No doubt it will. No matter what provisions may be in the treaty, Germany will almost certainly claim before the reparation commission that she must receive credit for the actual value of German property seized here, and as proof that sales were not for actual value she will point to Mr. Palmer's statements and boasts. Who will say that she will not be credited and the United States charged with such actual value? Her financial condition and that of Europe in general is such that the strong chances are that she will be so credited and we will be correspondingly charged. Mr. Palmer has boasted that he "was not going to hunt around to find the best time to place millions in the United States Treasury for these Germans." Time will tell whether Mr. Palmer in neglecting to sell at the best times was acting for or against the best interests of his own country. Unless I am mistaken, time will prove that his administration was a liability.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I refuse to yield, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey declines to yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I merely wish to ask a question with reference to the effect of the resolution of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I ask the Senator from New Jersey if it is going to be the purpose of this committee to try to lay a foundation whereby Germany can present a claim against the United States?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not at all, Mr. President. My contention is and always has been that it was the duty of the Alien Property Custodian to collect as much money as possible from these German industries in order that we might indemnify those who lost their lives on the Lusitania and those who have lost property through Germany's outrage against our shipping and against human life. He is a common-law trustee, and it was his duty as common-law trustee to safeguard the property. That is what I want this resolution for, so that the Senate may know whether he has administered the Alien Property Custodian's office in a capable, efficient, and honest manner.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am anxious to finish, but I will yield. I do not wish to be discourteous.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I wish to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he feels that it is the proper duty of a committee of the Senate to hunt up evidence to protect the Government of the United States against a claim which in his mind he thinks Germany will present, or should not that testimony then be found by the Department of Justice rather than the Senate of the United States? If the Senator's position is true, if such is the purpose of the resolution, then I think we should all vote against it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The purpose of the resolution is to make an investigation as to how Mr. Palmer handled the Alien Property Custodian's office and how he administered that great trust.

Aside from the fact that Germany will claim that she should be credited with actual value of property seized here, Mr.

Palmer is a lawyer and admits that he acted as a trustee. As a lawyer he must have known the duties of a trustee. It is hardly necessary for me in a body composed of so many lawyers to call attention to the rule that a trustee in making sales must always try to secure the best possible prices.

In the course of the hearings before the subcommittee counsel for some of the parties, who vigorously protested Mr. Palmer's administration, claimed that he should not be made Attorney General, because that would place their clients in the embarrassing position of having to appeal to him as Attorney General, for the Attorney General would be determining his own acts as Alien Property Custodian.

Senator DILLINGHAM quoted at the end of one of the hearings from a statement made by a lawyer who filed charges and made an argument against the appointment. I hesitate to read it, but it is a quotation, and I therefore feel within my rights:

Senator DILLINGHAM. Before you leave that subject, it appears he raises one of the same questions that were raised by Mr. Remington this afternoon. I would like to read it and ask you about it. He says:

"Until the exchange of ratification of the peace treaty not an alien enemy or ally of enemy may make claim for the return of property taken over by the Alien Property Custodian under the provisions of section 9 of the trading-with-the-enemy act. The Department of Justice is vested with jurisdiction to determine whether or not any claim under section 9 shall be allowed, and also is empowered to conduct the defense of any litigation filed against the Alien Property Custodian. This section is the only remedial provision in the act, and it is under this section that any irregularities or wrongs that have resulted in the taking over of property may be corrected.

"In view of this fact, the withdrawal of Mr. Palmer as Alien Property Custodian at a time when he had practically completed the taking over of all enemy property in this country, and appointing him as Attorney General, places him in the position of checking over his own work, correcting his own irregularities, and righting his own wrongs, and is, in fact, the nullification of legislative intent and purpose by Executive order."

Mr. President, I have presented these facts, believing, as I do, that it is our public duty as Senators to support the resolution and see that a committee of the Senate is appointed to make not only an investigation of the trusteeship of the Alien Property Custodian but to ascertain what moneys have been collected and what moneys have been spent, in fact, a public audit, in order that the Senate may know, bearing the responsibility as they do of conserving these funds, how they have been administered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I had hoped that we should be able to consider in executive session this evening the nomination of Mr. Palmer for the position of Attorney General, which has been discussed by the Senator from New Jersey; but I think, perhaps, it may be advisable—at least I should desire to consider whether it may not be advisable—to say something in reply to the comments of the distinguished Senator who has just addressed the Senate. My present impression is that none is required.

As has been stated, the nomination came before the Judiciary Committee before the close of the last session. The subject which occupied most of the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey was then presented to the committee. The committee investigated the matter and unanimously reported in favor of the nomination of Mr. Palmer.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Was the translation of the Albert memorandum found in Dr. Albert's bag before the committee at that time?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can not recall that it was before the committee at that time; but it is a matter of no consequence whether it was or was not, in my own judgment about the matter, for the New York World editorial, which gives the salient facts of the so-called Albert memorandum, was before the committee. The committee—the majority being Democrats—reported favorably upon the nomination, but the report was then unanimous; there was no dissenting voice whatever. The nomination came before the Senate again after the present session began. It was, as stated, referred to a subcommittee. The Senator from New Jersey appeared before the committee and called our attention to the matter of which he has now spoken. The subcommittee spent a very large amount of time—an unusually large amount of time—in investigating the matter.

The majority of the committee, of course, were Republicans—three Republicans and two Democrats—and there was again a unanimous report of the subcommittee in favor of the nomination. It went to the full committee, and the full committee, without any dissenting voice whatever, confirmed the action of the subcommittee.

In view of the situation of affairs, I do not know that it will be necessary to say anything in reply to what has now been said, particularly, Mr. President, as the matters to which the Senator has referred have twice been given to the public. They were given to the public on the occasion to which the Senator has referred, and the matter was published by the New York World; all the newspapers carried it at that time. It was again published when the matters were heard before the subcommittee. As was stated, the hearings were made public. This is the third time the public have heard the same story. So it may not be necessary to say anything further in reply; but, however that may be, I shall not ask an executive session for the consideration of the nomination to-night.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to submit for the RECORD an editorial from the New York Times with regard to world trade obstacles, in which they charge Congress with not having provided the mechanism by which to furnish the credit to Europe. There are pending four measures before the Committee on Banking and Currency. One of them has already been reported to the Senate—the Edge bill—which would serve to give this relief, and I call the attention of the Senate to the importance of this matter. It affects a billion dollars of international commerce.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WORLD TRADE OBSTACLES.

"Senator OWEN's letter to the President ought to bring to an end the obstruction to our foreign trade by the game of cross-purposes in which too many are playing their own hands without regard to their partners. Billions are immediately at stake, and beyond all money estimates are considerations of duty toward our allies and toward some hundred million starving people who have no claim beyond their need, and no hope if it is not to be found here. Long ago Mr. Davison said that the right sort of Americans could not sleep nights without helping the world if they had seen what he had seen. Day by day Mr. Hoover, who is now traveling Mr. Davison's ground over again, becomes more pressing and pathetic as he tells how the peoples of the new nations call the Americans 'their saviors,' and must face the winter without cows for meat or milk and with only such grain as women can cut in half-tilled fields with sickles. Yet every day we read of our storehouses bursting with the raw material of profitable commerce, to say nothing of charity, and threatening ourselves with a price crisis if it is not disposed of. The reason why this surplus is not on its errand of mercy and profit is that we are unprepared with the machinery of peace as we were unready for war. But there is this difference—war preparedness is for an emergency, to be dismantled in peace, but what is now needed is preparedness for our new and permanent position in world trade. The progress of years can be compressed into months or even weeks. But Washington does not give the cue—does nothing, in fact, but dispute where the blame lies.

"Senator OWEN says that the New York banks block the way in order to preserve their profits in foreign exchange dealings. There is not heard here any rejoicing over foreign exchange profiteering. Rather the talk is that the business is ruined for the present. The New York bankers repay the Senator's compliment in kind. It seems to them that the present emergency is not a banking matter primarily, but one in which the Government should play a leading part. Bankers whose deposits are payable on demand can not give credit for the time necessary for trade to revive in the devastated countries, which can not repay until their trade is born again. Neither can foreign traders finance their exports. It is not their business, and if they attempted it their capital would soon all be locked up in goods on long credit and their production would have to stop with their employment of labor and wage payments.

"The Senator gives no authority for his charges, but if he would ask those whom he accuses he would find that they have their complaint to make. More than one New York proposal has been laid before more than one department in Washington, and been cold-shouldered. There are merits in some of the proposals at Washington, but not one of them rises to the multi-billion class, or takes note of the new-born nations, the neediest of all, which need sponsoring for a period. It is idle to provide a single billion of rediscounts, conditioned on indorsements by sellers of goods. It is not their business to consider political risks, and the indorsements would more properly come from the foreign banks and Governments. If such indorsements are not sufficient, private traders do not want the business, but would do it if our Government would help. It will be seen that the situation is new in its mixture of politics and commerce, with all the need on one side and all the goods on the other. It is a case for exchange in its broadest aspect, for at present the current is one way, but a case for purveying on credit, not credit between Governments, but credit between private traders, who have a ground for Government guarantee, or at least Government sharing of risk by vouching for buyers, perhaps accredited by foreign Governments.

"The acuteness of the moment arises from the fact that the ten billions authorized to be lent by our Treasury has been exhausted, and that England is resolved to borrow no more. But England has not stopped lending, for she well knows that lenders in desperate times make the best friends and the greatest profits. Last week England lent Finland £6,000,000 to be spent for British goods. Even Canada, according to last week's cable from Bucharest, has lent $25,000,000 in Roumania, and will get trade which we need to have. No one knows just what is to be done with the funds raised here last week by sales of British-owned securities in round amounts. England's professed indifference to the American price for the pound makes it unlikely that the funds will be spent in supporting sterling. They may be taken to London and lent to the new countries to whose distress and trade we are indifferent. That would amount to a substitution of securities, we taking the old seasoned sort, and England taking the new untried sort and the trade which goes with them. Trade profits are greater than bankers' profits, for bankers' profits are made once and trade flourishes on repeat orders. Another cable last week gives food for thought. Six Bremen merchants, without either cash or credit, mortgaged their mills and bought our cotton. If our Government insists upon our doing a retail business, more business of that sort might be done, we furnishing the raw materials and retaining a lien upon them until the manufactured goods, less the makers' profit, are delivered in payment by barter, cutting out the currency complications. Some day the world will not be content to do business in goods in a way which makes it necessary to trade in currencies to close the transaction. There is a story that in Mr. Carnegie's earlier and needy days he found Mr. Phipps useful because he could keep a check afloat longer than any other man. In foreign trade there are too many opportunities of that sort of floating credit, and there is a great need of payments directly between the parties doing business together. Now is not the time for innovations of which theorists are fond. But there is a need that Washington should have a better appreciation of the part it should play in cooperation with men of business and bankers, who need help more than scolding."

Mr. OWEN. The Times is in error in the idea that the banks are accused of speculating in foreign exchange. The general short selling of exchange of the foreign exchange banks is notorious, and it is no accusation to comment on the obvious.

The New York banks have opposed the Federal reserve foreign bank and the foreign finance corporation bill, in both of which the United States Government would take a part.

The Times is of opinion the Government should help. The banks have not been of that opinion beyond favoring the Edge bill. They have taken the contrary ground and opposed the United States Government giving governmental support or being represented in such enterprises.

I shall be glad to see some evidence of their change of attitude. Our international balance of trade fell off $400,000,000 for July from what it was in June. If this goes on, America's opportunity as a world leader will be gone and the exchanges will react to normal by commodity balances going against us instead of for us.

The ability of Europe to repay her debts is shown by Albert Breton, vice president in charge of the foreign exchange department of the Guaranty Trust Co., in a statement yesterday, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REVIVAL IN EUROPE NEAR, BANKER SAYS—ALBERT BRETON RETURNS OPTIMISTIC AS TO FRANCE, ITALY, AND BELGIUM—WOULD OPEN CREDITS HERE—FINDS FRANCE IN NEED OF LABOR—ITALY PUSHING OUT FOR TRADE—BELGIAN INDUSTRIES RESUMING.

"Considering that Europe has been at war for five years, and that the countries have lost tremendously in men and treasure, the situation is very far from being black," said Albert Breton, vice president of the Guaranty Trust Co., who returned to his desk yesterday after being abroad for several weeks. Mr. Breton said he was anything but a pessimist on affairs in France and Belgium and predicted that they would work out their problems much sooner than many in this country believed.

"Regarding the part America is to play in helping European countries back to normal, Mr. Breton thought it would not be so difficult as it seemed a few months ago. Against the previous estimates of several billions needed for the rehabilitation of France, Italy, and Belgium, Mr. Breton thought that for the next 12 months a little more than $1,000,000,000 would suffice. He put the amount which France should receive from the United States at $400,000,000, Italy's requirements at $500,000,000, and those of Belgium at about $200,000,000. Some of these sums, he thought, could probably be shaded somewhat.

"'Europe just now wants raw materials and some special machinery,' he said. 'We should let them have the raw materials, and maybe some of the machinery they will need so that their manufacturers can resume operation and their people can find employment. They hope we will arrange for the opening of credits in their behalf so that their industrial and commercial affairs may go ahead.'

"Mr. Breton believed that credits could be opened at once, or in the very near future. There is no disposition, he said, to criticize the United States for not having made these arrangements sooner, for the Europeans realize that we have a great problem over here and will experience difficulty getting plans into working order, just as they are having some difficulty in arriving at definite conclusions as to their wants.

"Concerning the labor problem, Mr. Breton said conditions in France were unusual. There is less unrest in France than in some other countries, but labor is scarce. The French Government is arranging to import Italian and Polish labor, and in addition will have the services of several hundred thousand German prisoners of war.

"Italy, Mr. Breton continued, needs food and other commodities very badly, but the Italians have adopted an aggressive business policy and may improve their situation much sooner than many expect. They are already making heroic efforts for commercial opportunities in the Balkans and the Near East. One big Italian bank recently opened a credit of 50,000,000 lira for Polish merchants, and several Italian banks are opening branches in cities such as Constantinople, while others are pushing up into Poland. Some branches have been opened in Warsaw and others are expected to follow.

"In Belgium conditions are improving steadily and rapidly, Mr. Breton said. The cotton mills are running well, and other factories are getting started. There is some shortage of leather belting and copper, due to the ravages of the German military, but expedients are being resorted to. Unemployment has almost disappeared in Belgium. Antwerp is an extremely busy port, and Mr. Breton said it was expected to become busier, as it is the natural clearing point for important parts of Germany as well as for Belgium.

"In northern France the mills and factories are reopening, and many of the population who were moved elsewhere went back as soon as the German armies withdrew.

"Mr. Breton said he thought France would be able to anticipate a substantial part of the German indemnity by opening credits here. The indemnity, he explained, would be paid over a term of years probably; and while it will be of great benefit to France in the long run, it may be desirable to anticipate some of the payments in other markets."

Mr. OWEN. That England can take care of herself is well shown by Mr. Edgar in the article which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sunday, Aug. 24, 1919.]

SEES BRITAIN FAR FROM BANKRUPT—LONDON FINANCIER THINKS A FALSE IMPRESSION HAS BEEN CREATED HERE—WELCOMES COOPERATION—BUT THERE IS NO REASON TO FEAR AMERICAN COMPETITION, SAYS E. M. EDGAR—OUR PART IN WORLD TRADE—NEVER LIKELY TO EQUAL BRITAIN'S, HE SAYS, BECAUSE WE LACK THE NEED OF EXPANSION.

"LONDON, August 22.

"Much interest has been excited here by an article headed 'The answer to Mr. Vanderlip,' which appears in the current number of Sperling's Journal, from the pen of E. Mackay Edgar. Mr. Edgar, who recently returned from a visit to America, is the head of the well-known London firm of Sperling & Co., which held for many years a prominent position in financing American and other foreign enterprises.

"In his article Mr. Edgar not only criticizes Mr. Vanderlip's scheme for an international loan on behalf of Europe, but draws a much more optimistic picture of Great Britain's commercial prospects in the face of American competition than has yet been presented to the public on either side of the Atlantic. In an interview to-day with the New York Times representative Mr. Edgar further developed his views:

"My position, he said, is very simple. I welcome American cooperation; that is to say, the cooperation of British and American firms and interests and groups that are working along the same lines, and I believe it will be mutually advantageous. But I do not fear American competition; on the contrary, I see some reasons for thinking we in Great Britain are in many ways in a sounder position than America, that we hold the winning cards, and if we play them rightly shall soon regain all we have lost and a little more into the bargain.

"When I was in New York the other day I found people talking as though Great Britain was bankrupt. They were very kind about it and wanted to help us and had no idea of taking advantage of our extremity, but they frankly thought we were done for. Of course, as you know, that is all nonsence. There is no lack of credit facilities at this moment in Great Britain. Anyone can get all the money he wants for a sound enterprise. London is still as much as ever the center and clearing house of international trade and finance. Our capacity for production has been immensely increased by the war, and directly our workmen settle down to work we shall go bounding ahead.

"What I think misleads many of our friends in New York is the decline of the pound sterling as measured in American dollars, and the spectacle of the debt which the British Government owes the American Government. But the fall in the value of sterling hurts America more than it hurts us. It forces us to cut down our American purchases to a minimum. It operates as effectively as heavy exports against the shipment of American goods and products abroad. It hampers America in getting rid of the immense stocks of commodities of all kinds which she accumulated at war prices. It therefore tends to bring about a state of congestion which can be relieved only by selling at a loss, by diminishing production, or by lowering wages; and in the present temper of American labor and with the bitter outcry against the high cost of living, none of these alternatives is pleasant.

"The truth is that production prices and wages have reached such an inordinately uneconomic point in the United States that something is bound to give way. As for the British debt, I look upon it as a bond of commercial union between the two lands. As America can not proceed against us for the recovery of the sums owing to her, she is compelled by her own interests to assist our prosperity and join in putting our solvency and our ability to pay off our loans beyond question. But, in any case, except so far as they affect the course of exchange, these intergovernmental debts are a minor matter. They have very little to do with commercial and international finance.

"Some Americans seem to think New York will displace London in world finance. The Americans certainly will not do it by making loans to Governments; I doubt whether they will do it in any event. The advantages of experience, habit, geographical position, and the possession of unique facilities which Mr. Vanderlip freely concedes to London are very real advantages. That is proved by the fact that London is to-day doing as much business as ever.

"But there is another reason for British confidence. You can get a safe 7 per cent almost anywhere you like in America. How can a country of which that can be said, a country that is still amazingly underdeveloped and underpopulated, and that offers within her own boundaries limitless opportunity for development, play a big part in international finance? Where is the inducement? Why should the American investor venture into an unknown field and run greater risks for the sake of getting smaller returns? Therefore I think London will long continue to hold her own in international trade and finance.

"It is the same with shipping. I have some very big shipbuilding interests in Great Britain, and I do not fear American competition. Why not? Well, for several reasons. One is that American yards can not yet turn out special ships for special trades. That is the backbone of the British mercantile marine. Secondly, their costs of construction are very far ahead of ours. Thirdly, the expenses of operating American ships are at least 30 per cent heavier than ours. Fourthly, they have not even the beginning of that wonderful network and organization of shipping agencies which our people have built up all around the world. Fifthly, a mercantile marine, while a necessity to Great Britain, is a luxury to America. Sixthly, the American instinct for the sea has been very greatly impaired in the United States, and an ordinary American can always get a better paid and more congenial job on land.

"So, too, with foreign commerce. America made a magnificent burst into the arena during the war, but I doubt whether she will be able to maintain it. Here, again, the element of compulsion is lacking. Our foreign trade is absolutely vital to us; to Americans it is merely a convenient way of disposing of their surplus. America is so huge; her command of her own market of 110,000,000 people so secure, and her domestic demands likely to be on so prodigious a scale that 10 years hence you may easily find that the smaller profits and longer credits of international trade will have little attraction for her people.

"Again, America is reaching the end of some of her most valuable raw materials and natural resources. Already she is importing oil for her own consumption; she will soon be importing copper—perhaps even wheat. Her 'magnates' are rightly and shrewdly looking ahead and scouring the world for reserves of basic metals and minerals that will make good their own dwindling supplies; but wherever they turn they find that British enterprise has been before them. We hold many of these essential key positions in our own hands. Even if they do not lie inside the British Empire, they are controlled by British capital. America one of these days—and not very distant days, either—will have to come to us for the oil, copper, and, perhaps, the iron ore she needs, just as she has come to us for wool. That is why I for one am not greatly disturbed by America's competition.

"The social and industrial difficulties ahead of her are at least as menacing as any that confront us; in my opinion they are more so. Try to look ahead 10 or 15 years, and you will see, I think, that it is the Americans, and not ourselves, who have greater cause for uneasiness. What it really comes to is that we are in the same boat and have everything to gain by pulling together. Commercial partnerships and understandings between groups of Englishmen and Americans who are engaged in the same lines of business are, in my judgment, the most fruitful form that an Anglo-American alliance could take."

Mr. OWEN. I hope, Mr. President, the Congress and the President will act. I have, at least, done what I could to solve this problem.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 26, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 25, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, open our eyes to the beauty of holiness, that we may worship Thee in spirit and in truth and receive that spiritual momentum which shall guide us through the intricate problems of life; that we may quit ourselves like men, satisfy our longings, and come into closer relationship with Thee and our fellow men in love. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, August 22, 1919, was read and approved.

The Speaker announced that 241 Members had answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to prefer a request for unanimous consent. The 17th of September is the anniversary of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. I desire at that time, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, to address the House for 40 minutes on constitutional government.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that on the 17th of September—the anniversary of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States—he may address the House for 40 minutes after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District business. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. MAPES. And pending that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see if we can arrange upon the time for general debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. What time does the gentleman suggest?

The SPEAKER. On what bill?

Mr. MAPES. On all bills from the Committee on the District of Columbia. I have requests on this side that will take about 45 minutes. I should like to agree, if we can, upon one hour and a half of general debate, one-half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and one-half by myself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. CANNON. Is that on all bills? I do not know how many bills there are or what they are.

Mr. MAPES. Pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. Speaker, I ask that general debate be limited to 1 hour and 30 minutes, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky and one-half to be controlled by myself.

Mr. CANNON. I shall object to the request in that form, because there may be a dozen or half a dozen bills.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This is general debate, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. General debate on all bills.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, there are only three bills that could be considered, as I understand it, under the rules in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. One of them is the teachers' retirement bill. The other two are short bills. One of them is a formal bill to authorize the constituents of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] to remove the body of a child to his district who died and was buried in the District, and the other is to authorize corporations in the District of Columbia to change their name on a vote of the directors and stockholders.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that he make his motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District bills, and then, to avoid any objection, ask unanimous consent for 1 hour and 30 minutes' debate on the first bill, and the rest of it can take care of itself when it comes up.

Mr. MAPES. I shall have to do that, Mr. Speaker, if there is objection, but this is the usual request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent, pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, that the general debate on the first bill be limited to one hour and a half, half the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Kentucky. Is there objection?

COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his motion for a moment, to give me time to submit a resolution?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I submit the following resolution relative to committee assignments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming submits a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That KING SWOPE, Member of Congress from Kentucky, be, and he is hereby, elected member of the standing committees of the House, as follows: Immigration and Naturalization, Patents, Expenditures in the War Department.

The resolution was agreed to.

RETIREMENT OF SCHOOL-TEACHERS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The motion of Mr. MAPES was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with Mr. REAVIS in the chair.

Mr. REAVIS took the chair amid applause.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I call up H. R. 5818, for the retirement of public-school teachers in the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I should like to occupy about 15 minutes of the time allotted to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be notified when he has occupied 15 minutes?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, society has come to recognize that the person who gives his life to an employer or to an industry must be provided for in his old age. The big employers of labor are more and more making such provision for their employees and their action is justified quite as much upon the ground of benefit to the industry as it is upon the ground of justice to the employee. The time has passed when it is necessary to argue the advisability or propriety of such action.

All the arguments in favor of making some provision for the retirement of the superannuated employee in industry or in the civil service of the Government generally apply with greater force in favor of retirement legislation for teachers. The good of society and the interests of the children demand that the superannuated teacher shall be retired, and justice to the teacher requires that he shall not be compelled to go to the poorhouse upon retirement after he has devoted his life to the teaching service. Retirement legislation tends to make the teaching force more efficient and more competent by eliminating the superannuated teacher as well as eliminating the worry of the teacher in the service over what is to become of him in his old age.

No great harm is done society by the retention of the superannuated in industry or in the ordinary departments of the Government, although by doing so the business at hand is undoubtedly made more expensive and less efficient. The superannuated Government employee in the majority of the departments of the Government may be kept upon the pay roll even though he is obliged to have an attendant bring him to the department in the morning and call for him at night without any irredeemable injury being done to society in general, even though the expense of doing the Government business is increased and the morale of the other workers weakened. Someone else can, however, do the work and society in general is not injured; but this can not be said of the teacher. The growing children are made to suffer if an incompetent and superannuated teacher is allowed to stay in the schools because he has no way to live if he should retire, and society owes it to the children to see to it that this does not happen.

In recognition of this principle teachers' retirement legislation, in one form or another, has been passed during the last few years in 35 States of the Union, and this bill proposes to put the District of Columbia on a par with those States as far as this class of legislation is concerned.

In the majority of the 35 States that have legislated upon the subject the law is State wide, although in some of them it relates only to certain cities or municipalities within the State.

The District of Columbia has a retirement law for its policemen and firemen, but it has none for the teachers in its schools. The last District appropriation bill carried an item of $218,724.36 for the policemen and firemen relief fund.

The legislation on the subject by the different States has been haphazard and in most cases unscientific. There has been no uniformity in it. There have been almost as many different systems as there are different States that have legislated upon the subject. In some States the teachers contribute to the fund; in others the State appropriates all that is paid to the teachers after their retirement. In a majority of the States that have legislated upon the subject, however, the teachers contribute a part and the State appropriates a part. In a number of the States the contribution of the teacher is small. In some States it is as low as $5 per year; in a number 1 per cent of the salary; in others from 3 to 7 per cent of the salary. In some States it is optional with the teachers to go into the system or not, as they see fit; in others it is compulsory for them to do so. In some States the retirement is based upon the age of the teacher; in others it is based upon the length of service of the teacher, without regard to age, such as Minnesota, where the teacher is allowed to retire after only 20 years of service in the schools, even though he may have started to teach at an early age; and in still others it is based upon service and age combined. Most of the States have created a general fund which is credited with whatever is paid into it. A few have adopted the system followed in this bill, of keeping separate accounts for the different teachers and allowing them to draw out of the fund upon their separation from the schools whatever amount has been deducted from their salaries or whatever they have paid into the fund, with interest.

The amount received by the teachers upon retirement also varies in the different States. It frequently depends upon their average salary received for a few years before retirement. It ranges from a minimum of $150 in Maine to a maximum of $800 per year in several States, and in others 60 per cent of the average salary for the last few years of service.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BEE. I have not read all of the bill, and I ask for information. I notice that any teacher who shall have reached the age of 62 years may be retired by the board of education on its own motion or on application.

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Have you any provision for the retirement of a teacher under 62 years of age except, under section 4, which applies to any teacher who by reason of accident or illness has become mentally incapable?

Mr. MAPES. That is all.

Mr. BEE. Does not the gentleman think the age of 62 is a rather high age to put the limit at which the board shall have discretion? In other words, a man of 50 or 55 may have become so useless that it would be desirable to retire him. I speak of that because I was a member of a school board for many years and we were confronted with that question.

Mr. MAPES. The committee has authorized me to offer an amendment to that section which will allow a teacher, after 15 years of service in the schools of the District, to retire in case of accident or illness, regardless of age, in addition to those who have reached the age of 45 years.

Mr. BEE. The bill says "accident or illness not due to vicious habits." There might be such complete inefficiency in a person 55 or 60 years old that that person would be a detriment to the entire schools. I wondered whether there was anything to cover such cases.

Mr. MAPES. There might be individual cases of that kind, but students of this question have quite generally agreed upon 62 years as being the proper age for the retirement of teachers. It seems to me that a person ought not to be compulsorily retired from the activities of his profession any earlier than that.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Very briefly.

Mr. SEARS. How long does a teacher have to be employed as a teacher in the District under this bill before he can be entitled to retirement, or an annuity, or whatever you call it?

Mr. MAPES. A teacher must have taught at least 10 years immediately prior to his retirement before he comes under the provisions of this bill. I will say to the gentleman that I will endeavor to explain the different provisions of the bill, if he will allow me to proceed.

Mr. SEARS. I am very much interested in the teachers.

Mr. MAPES. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed, I shall be glad to answer any questions that I can after I have made a brief explanation of the bill.

It is believed that this bill is based upon the best and most approved principles of teachers' retirement legislation. Those interested in it have been working upon it for a number of years, and they feel that the bill comes as nearly being financially sound as it is possible to make this class of legislation. The principles adopted in recent legislation in New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts have been followed in general outline in drafting the bill.

The bill has the approval of the great majority of the teachers of the District who will be personally affected by it, and is indorsed by the Board of Education, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and by various citizens' associations of the District. A bill similar in all essential features passed the Senate in the last Congress. That bill was submitted to a vote of the teachers of the District and about 94 per cent of them indorsed it unqualifiedly, the other 6 per cent criticized some of its features, but only 1 opposed it absolutely, and he stated that he did so because he did not believe in any form of pension legislation.

In the last few years special study has been made of the subject of teachers' retirement legislation by the National Educational Association and by the Carnegie Foundation for the advancement of teaching, with a view of formulating a plan which would avoid some of the pitfalls that the States have gotten into. It is attempted in this bill to incorporate the sound principles adopted by the different States and recommended by these organizations.

It has been learned from experience that it is just as difficult to get something for nothing out of teachers' retirement funds as it is out of anything else. This bill does not attempt it. It adopts the contributory plan—every teacher in the service is obliged to contribute to the fund. It proposes to deduct out of his salary from year to year enough to buy a certain annuity for the rest of his life after his retirement, and to that annuity the District is to add its contribution of $10 per year for every year that the teacher has taught in its schools.

The bill provides that there shall be deducted from the basic salary of every teacher in the public schools of the District of Columbia every year an amount sufficient, with interest at 4 per cent per annum, compounded annually, to purchase an annuity equal to 1 per cent of his annual basic salary for each year of his whole term of service. That means that if a teacher teaches 40 years after this legislation goes into effect on an annual basic salary of $800 enough money will have been deducted from his salary at the end of the 40 years to buy him an annuity for the rest of his expectancy of life after retirement of 1 per cent of $800, or $8, multiplied by 40, the number of years that he has been in the service, making $320 per year. It is figured that the deduction for teachers who enter the service and teach for 40 years will be approximately 4 per cent of their salary each year, or $32 per year for the teacher who receives a basic salary of $800 per year. Of course, it will be more for those who enter the service later in life and it will be more for those who have been teaching a number of years at the time the law goes into effect, but the bill provides that the deductions shall in no case exceed 8 per cent of the teacher's annual basic salary.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. THOMAS. To put a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MAPES. I will yield for a brief question.

Mr. THOMAS. Can the gentleman give any good reason why the teachers should be entitled to a pension any more than the farmers, the coal miners, the carpenters, or any other laborer?

Mr. MAPES. I supposed, Mr. Chairman, it was unnecessary to argue the merits of general retirement legislation. For that reason and because my time was limited I thought it best to devote the most of my time to an explanation of the special provisions of the bill rather than to a discussion of the general principles upon which this legislation is based.

As I have said, I believe it is generally conceded that anyone who has given himself to an employer or to an industry during the period of his actual life should be taken care of by that industry or employer in his old age, and all the arguments in favor of taking care of the employee in industry apply with greater force to the Government taking care of teachers in their old age who have spent their lives in educating and bringing up the children. The good of the schools, the good of society demand that the old teachers in the schools be taken out and provided for in their old age, as well as the good of the teachers.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MAPES. I can not yield any further.

Mr. THOMAS. I believe that the teachers should have adequate compensation.

Mr. MAPES. The Secretary of the Treasury is to have charge of the funds paid in by the teachers and prepare and keep all needful tables, records, and accounts required for carrying out its provisions.

He is also required to file with the board of education at the beginning of each school year a certificate showing the amount of deduction to be made from the salary of each teacher during the year.

The amount deducted is to be deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury and invested by him until paid out as provided by the law. The amount paid in by each teacher is to be compounded annually and credited to his individual account.

At the age of 62 a teacher may retire upon his own motion or upon the motion of the board of education. At the age of 70 he is obliged to retire unless the board of education considers it for the good of the service to retain him longer.

The bill also makes provision for the retirement of the teacher who has reached the age of 45 who, by reason of accident or illness not due to vicious habits, has become physically or mentally disabled so as to be incapable of performing the duties of a teacher.

Upon retirement a teacher shall receive a sum equal to 1 per cent of his average basic salary for each year of his whole term of service, the amount which the deductions from his salary has purchased, and an additional sum of $10 for each year that the teacher has taught. The bill provides that a teacher who is retired on account of age shall not receive less than $480 per year and that the annuity of a teacher retired on account of disability shall not be less than $420 per year.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAPES. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. I see that the bill is entitled "An act for the retirement of the public-school teachers in the District of Columbia." As the chairman has stated, nearly every State has a retirement law. But there are other teachers in the public employment who are not in the District of Columbia; they are in public schools in the Government of Alaska, in the Philippine Islands, the Hawaiian Islands, and in the Canal Zone. I want to ask the gentleman if the committee has considered teachers in the public service outside of the District of Columbia, who, it occurs to me, are just as much entitled to the benefits of the act as are the teachers in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MAPES. The Committee on the District of Columbia do not have jurisdiction of legislation pertaining to teachers in those places.

Mr. MILLER. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. MAPES. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. Does not the chairman think it worth while for the provision to be included in this bill covering those teachers outside of the District?

Mr. MAPES. Of course, Mr. Chairman, a provision of that kind deserves consideration by some committee, but it ought not to be put on a bill when it has not been considered at all, and it would not be in order on this bill.

Mr. FESS. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I asked him a question?

Mr. MAPES. Not at all.

Mr. FESS. Is this bill confined to teaching in the District—for 10 years? Suppose the teacher has been brought here at the age of 52 years after having been teaching elsewhere. He begins his teaching here at the age of 52 years.

Mr. MAPES. I get the gentleman's point. The bill provides that teachers may be given credit for 10 years' service in the public schools outside of the District of Columbia, but not for a greater period than 10 years.

Mr. FESS. That answers the question.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] wish to ask me a question?

Mr. SEARS. I believe the gentleman stated they would have to be in the service for 10 years before they could be retired. Why did the gentleman limit the age to 52 years? In other words, a teacher 53 years of age, employed to teach in the District of Columbia, who teaches 15 years would not be entitled to anything.

Mr. MAPES. Of course, any law of this kind has to fix some arbitrary figure. The limit has to be fixed somewhere, and the students of the question have considered that anyone who comes into the service after he reaches the age of 52 ought not to expect to come within the provisions of the law which is to apply to those who give their life work to that service.

Mr. SEARS. Why does the gentleman reach the conclusion that the age of 62 years is the proper age at which to retire teachers?

Mr. MAPES. For the same reason.

Mr. SEARS. Does not the gentleman realize that there are many Members of the Senate and some of the House and many teachers—as he will if he has had anything to do with school work—who at the age of 62 are just in their prime?

Mr. MAPES. It is not so true as to teachers in the public schools who are taking care of from 20 to 40 and 50 pupils every day and who have been doing so for 40 years. As a rule, a teacher who arrives at that age ought not to be charged with that sort of responsiblity, and the gentleman's children and mine ought not to be obliged to go to school to a teacher who is over 62 years of age. That is true as a general proposition, although there are exceptions.

Mr. SEARS. How much has the gentleman figured under this bill will be deducted from the salary annually of the teacher? Is it 1 per cent?

Mr. MAPES. If a teacher is in the service when this bill goes into effect and continues in the service for 40 years——

Mr. SEARS. Well, for 10 years.

Mr. MAPES. The estimates are that there will be deducted from his salary about 4 per cent. Of course, those who have been in the service for several years when the law goes into effect will have to contribute more, but the bill limits the contribution to 8 per cent of the teacher's basic salary.

Mr. SEARS. I understand this bill goes back only 10 years.

Mr. MAPES. It does not go back at all.

Mr. SEARS. Well, the last 10 years after the passage of this bill is when you compute the deductions from—the average salary for those 10 years. Has the chairman figured out what would be the average amount of deduction of that teacher's salary who is getting $1,000? Is it 1 per cent or 4 per cent? I find a reference to 1 per cent and another place I find a reference to 4 per cent.

Mr. MAPES. Enough is to be deducted from the teacher's salary to make 1 per cent of the teacher's average salary for his term of service. The 1 per cent has nothing to do with the deduction. There is to be deducted enough to pay 1 per cent of the average salary for the whole length of service of the teacher.

The second part of the annuity—that is, the $10 for each year of the service of the teacher—shall be paid by appropriations, the same as the current expenses of the District of Columbia are paid, and if the deductions from the teacher's salary, with accumulated interest, are insufficient to pay the first part of the annuity, as they will be until the system gets into full operation, the deficiency shall be paid by appropriations in the same way.

In computing length of service retiring teachers shall be given credit for teaching in public schools outside of the District of Columbia for not to exceed 10 years, and in order to come under the provisions of the act the teacher must have taught continuously in the District of Columbia for at least 10 years immediately prior to his retirement in case of disability, and in case of retirement on account of age he must have taught continuously from the time of his attainment of the age of 52.

In case of the separation of a teacher from the service of the public schools prior to the age of 62, except for disability, he shall receive the amount of his deductions, together with the interest thereon, and in case of his death the same is paid to his legal representatives. This provision is considered to be very desirable. Much of the early legislation did not contain this feature, and as a result the teachers' retirement laws were unpopular among the younger teachers. Those who did not intend to make teaching their life work objected to the deduction from their salaries. By providing that the deductions, with interest, shall be paid to the teacher upon his separation from the service the objection to this feature is very largely eliminated. Recent legislation upon this subject contains some such provision.

The bill applies to all teachers who are on the rolls of the public schools in the month of June, 1919, and every teacher who continues in the service or who is hereafter appointed to the position of teacher in the public schools shall come under its provisions and shall be deemed to accept its terms.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed an additional five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, being opposed fundamentally to civil pensions, I can not become enthusiastic about this. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] has just said that this bill has the support of the school-teachers, and that it has the support of the citizens' associations of the District of Columbia. I am not surprised at all that it has, because anyone can see why the school-teachers would favor it. They are the beneficiaries of it. With a moment's explanation anyone can see how the several civic societies of the town favor it. Their reason for favoring it is that there is a fixed rate of taxation here on real estate, which, when summed up, amounts to $1 a hundred, which is a smaller rate of tax than is paid by any other city of comparable size in the United States. No matter whether the expenditures are large or small, that rate of taxation remains just the same. Under that rate of taxation, because the United States pays half of the tax here, or equivalent to that, a large surplus has accumulated to the credit of the District of Columbia. That surplus must be dissipated in some way or other, and the citizens' associations of the town are anxious to dissipate it in order that the United States Government may continue to pay one-half of the operating expenses of the District of Columbia.

Another fact must be borne in mind concerning this bill, and that is this: One-half of whatever is paid in the way of pensions to the school-teachers here by the District of Columbia will be paid by levying a tax upon the people throughout the rest of the United States, the school-teachers in the various States included. If this should become law every school-teacher throughout the length and breadth of the United States will pay a tax to help pay the pension of the school-teachers of the District of Columbia.

These suggestions are all that I care to make relative to the bill, with the exception of one other feature, which is this: Under this bill the superintendent of schools is to be pensioned. This pension will be $1,000 a year. He is now receiving a salary of $6,000 a year. I do not believe that any man getting a salary of $6,000 a year ought to be conniving with other people to have a salary of $1,000, or any other sum in the way of pension, allowed to him.

I might say further that the chairman has just referred to the pensioning of the policemen in the District of Columbia. I have watched the advance and the progress of the pension allowed to these policemen for a good many years now. In the beginning they asked the privilege of paying a portion each month of their salaries toward a fund to be used for pensioning disabled and retired policemen. That was granted. That was when the camel first put his nose into the tent. Next they asked that all of the stolen, lost, or unclaimed property found or taken in the District of Columbia might go to the policemen's pension fund. That was granted. Then, next, they asked that all fines in the police court might go to the policemen's pension fund. That was granted. Then they asked that all licenses on dogs, amounting to several thousand dollars a year, should go to the policemen's pension fund. That was granted. Then they came before the Congress and said there was a deficiency in the policemen's pension fund and they asked Congress to appropriate, just for that one term, this deficiency, and Congress made the appropriation. The next year there was another deficiency of some $50,000 or $60,000, the pensioners growing in number all of the time, and the amount allowed them growing accordingly. So that next year another deficiency was allowed them; deficiency after deficiency was allowed the policemen's pension fund until finally they succeeded in having the pension paid directly out of the Treasury, and that is the law now. Bear in mind, please, that the policemen everywhere else in the United States are contributing to the pension fund here, while those here are not contributing to the policemen's pension funds elsewhere in the United States. When this bill is passed the school-teachers in every part of this Union will contribute to the pension fund here, and the school-teachers in the District of Columbia will be contributing to no part of the school-teachers' pension fund elsewhere in the United States. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman has practically answered the question I had in mind. In other words, the gentleman believes that this in effect is class legislation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. To be sure it is, and I am glad to see my colleague from Kentucky in agreement with me about this bill.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does the gentleman see any reason why school-teachers should have a pension any more after serving 10 years than Congressmen who have served 10 years and spent all their salaries here in Washington under a profiteering system?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is no reason for a pension for either. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. For a short question, because I must limit my time for the use of others.

Mr. BLANTON. I could not get it from the chairman of the committee and therefore I have to resort to the gentleman from Kentucky. Will the gentleman tell us how many school-teachers there are now in the District of Columbia who will be subject to retirement under this bill immediately after its passage and whose minimum amount of $400 will have to be paid by the Government?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I recall when hearings were going on before the committee I asked that very question. I am not quite sure about it—and I will ask the gentleman from Michigan to correct me if I am mistaken—but my recollection is that the one of whom I asked that question, and she is a school-teacher, replied that there were about 56 who would be immediately retired. Am I not correct about that, Mr. MAPES?

Mr. MAPES. My information has been that there were 48 who would be immediately retired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is not much difference; it is only a matter of recollection with me.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. HASTINGS. How many school-teachers are there altogether in the District of Columbia?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. About 2,000. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have given up the floor, but I will take it again for a question.

Mr. MILLER. I understand the bill includes librarians.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; it does.

Mr. MILLER. What was the policy of the committee in including librarians to be retired? Does the committee know of any State in the American Union which retired teachers which also retired librarians?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Since I have not been advocating the measure I refer the gentleman to the gentleman from Michigan, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MAPES. If the gentleman will yield, of course this bill does not ask for the retirement of librarians proper. It only retires school librarians, teachers who are acting as librarians in schools and who perform a very valuable service.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. TINCHER. I have a very high regard for the gentleman's opinion on District matters, and I would like to know if he favors the passage of this bill by this Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman that during the eight years I was chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia I never helped to get it out of the committee. The last session the Senate passed a bill and sent it over to the House Committee on the District of Columbia. I have been accused of delaying its passage through that committee, and as to that I plead guilty. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. ROSE. I listened with a great deal of interest to what the gentleman said upon this bill, but it is not clear in my mind as to the provision which provided that all the school-teachers of the United States would be required to pay into this pension fund provided for the teachers of the District of Columbia only. Now, is that a fact?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In answer I say to the gentleman that one-half of the operating expenses of the District of Columbia are paid from the United States Treasury.

Mr. ROSE. Is that the policy upon which you base your statement, then?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The people of the United States make up the fund that is in the United States Treasury. The school-teachers are a part of the people who are taxed for that purpose.

Mr. ROSE. And then it is upon that ground that you make that statement?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire to use any more time now?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not intend to discuss the teachers' retirement bill. The time allotted to me I desire to use in making some comments upon the activities of the I. W. W. among the negroes in America.

The recent race riots in Washington and Chicago, and the many other similar disturbances throughout the country, have caused much speculation in the press as to the underlying causes of the conflict between the races. It is manifest that when sanguinary conflicts take place in cities so widely separated and within so short a time the cause is general and not local. Those who read the newspapers of the country know that there has been no propaganda to arouse the antagonism of the white man toward the negro. On the contrary, the very generous support of the war by the negro caused the white people of the Nation to entertain for him only the best of good feeling. For this sudden change in our relations, then, we must look to negro leadership to ascertain whether or not efforts have been made to disturb the harmonious relations heretofore existing in this country. The New York Times of August 5 carried a statement quoting Dr. L. B. Moore, dean of Howard University (negro), as saying that—

A well-trained teacher in one of our larger schools of the South told me that the colored people were being organized by representatives of the I. W. W., and we are in danger of having a little Russia in many sections of the South.

Coming from South Carolina, I think I know something of the negro, and I am convinced that there is little foundation for the opinion expressed by the dean of Howard University. In the South to-day the negro is prospering as never before in the history of his race. He is accumulating money, he is purchasing land, and through the assistance of the white man is daily bettering his condition. Left to ourselves there is no possibility of conditions arising in the South which would justify the description of a "little Russia."

But the statement above quoted, together with the general speculation as to the cause of the riots in Washington and Chicago, has caused me to inquire into the attitude of the negro press, and I have become convinced that the race antagonism manifesting itself throughout the country is due to the incendiary utterances of the would-be leaders of the race now being circulated through negro newspapers and magazines. It is evident that the leadership of Moton and others, who, following in the steps of Booker Washington, preached conservatism to the race, is now being challenged by a crowd of radicals who are appealing to the passions of the negroes and inciting them to deeds of violence. These radical leaders are urging their followers to resort to violence in order to secure privileges they believe themselves entitled to, and the recent riots indicate that many are accepting this bad advice. It is unfortunate that some negro leaders heretofore regarded as conservative have changed their attitude.

A fair illustration of this type is W. E. B. Du Bois, editor of the Crisis Magazine. Du Bois has heretofore rendered great service to his people by intelligent leadership. He has acquired influence over many thoughtful negroes, and therefore his capacity for evil is enlarged. The recent issues of his magazine are filled with appeals to the prejudice and the passions of the negro, which can have no other result than to incite him to deeds of violence. A fair example is an editorial in the May issue of the Crisis, page 13, where, under the headlines "Returning soldiers," he declares:

We sing: This country of ours, despite all its better souls have done and dreamed, is yet a shameful land.
It lynches. * * * It disfranchises its own citizens. * * * It encourages ignorance. * * * It steals from us. * * * It insults us.

To support each one of these statements he prints a short argument, concluding with the following:

This is the country to which we soldiers of democracy return. This is the fatherland for which we fought! But it is our fatherland. It was right for us to fight. The faults of our country are our faults. Under similar circumstances we would fight again. But by the God of heaven we are cowards and jackasses if now that the war is over we do not marshal every ounce of our brain and brawn to fight a sterner, longer, more unbending battle against the forces of hell in our own land.
We return.
We return from fighting.
We return fighting.
Make way for democracy! We saved it in France; and by the great Jehovah, we will save it in America or know the reason why.

The espionage law still in force provides that one who shall willfully print, write, or publish any language intended to incite, provoke, or encourage resistance to the United States, or who shall publish any abusive language about the form of government of the United States, shall be punished by a fine or imprisonment. If this editorial, which refers to this as a "shameful land," charging the Government with lynching, disfranchising its citizens, encouraging ignorance, and stealing from its citizens, does not constitute a violation of the espionage law, it is difficult to conceive language sufficiently abusive to constitute a violation. Believing this to be true, I have called this editorial to the attention of the Attorney General, with the request that if in the judgment of his department it does constitute a violation of the law, that proceedings be instituted against Du Bois. No greater service can be rendered to the negro to-day than to have him know that this Government will not tolerate on the part of a leader of his race action which constitutes a violation of the law and which tends to array the negro race against the Government under which they live and under which the race has made greater strides than it has under any other Government on earth. [Applause.]

The same issue of the Crisis, on page 20, carries, with the apparent approval of its editor, a letter written by a negro officer in France, containing this statement:

I am beginning to wonder whether it will ever be possible for me to see an American (white) without wishing that he were in his Satanic Majesty's private domain. I must pray long and earnestly that hatred of my fellow man be removed from my heart, and that I can truthfully lay claim to being a Christian.

As one can not well enter his Satanic Majesty's private domain until after death, his statement simply means that he wishes every American—white—was dead and in hell. His wish is qualified in no way. It applies alike to the white man of the North and of the South. And to think that this man was honored by his country with a commission as an officer of the United States Army! That his view is shared by other negroes who served as officers in the Army is evident from the statements of one William N. Colson, a contributing editor to the Messenger, another negro magazine. Colson claims to have been an officer in the Three hundred and sixty-seventh Infantry. In the July issue of the Messenger, under the headline "Propaganda and the American negro soldier," he writes:

A feeble and indefinite propaganda did spring up among the negro soldiers in France. In that democratic clime they found themselves. They felt better within themselves because they were fighting for France and for their race rather than for a flag which had no meaning.

I regret that any man for whom our flag had no meaning ever "found himself" in France or elsewhere in the uniform of an officer of the Army of the United States.

He tells us:

No intelligent American negro is willing to lay down his life for the United States as it now exists.

Again:

Intelligent negroes have all reached the point where their loyalty to the country is conditional.

I certainly hope that this does not accurately state the attitude of the intelligent negroes of America. But this man tells us, further:

The consensus of opinion among thinking colored people is that the war ended too soon. They believe that the American negro would have gotten a status had America been chastised more severely.

In other words, they regret, according to this ex-officer, that more of our boys were not forced to die in France. And in the August issue of the Messenger, this same officer, under the heading "An analysis of negro patriotism," writes:

The negro soon found that the treachery of the white American was infinitely more damaging to him than the Hun.
When black officers taught black men bayonet practice they usually substituted the picture of the rabid white southerner for that of the Hun. This method often inspired the soldier with the necessary dash and form.
The colored officer, maltreated and thrust aside, has cursed the flag and the country for which it stands a thousand times. Thousands of these soldiers now possess weapons to demonstrate, if need be, their legal right to self-defense against southern encroachments and lynch law.

Yet to-day these colored officers who cursed the flag are asking that in the permanent Military Establishment provision should be made for additional negro regiments with negro officers.

White men corresponding for newspapers and magazines have written many laudatory articles as to the negro in the trench. This negro officer, Colson, gives us a new and interesting trench scene when he writes:

Shortly after the armistice members of this same platoon were anticipating the return home. Most of them were from the South. An ingenious fellow caused an endless round of merriment when he cleverly placed each Southern State on an imaginary map of military operations. Georgia, Mississippi, Texas, and Alabama were put in no man's land. The border States, like Virginia and Kentucky, were the third-line trenches, etc.
The soldiers, all seated beneath an old apple tree, scarred by four years of German shrapnel, finally concluded that their next war for "democracy" would be in the land of "the Star Spangled Banner."

For criticism of our Government and of our flag, much less severe than the above statements, many white men were placed in jail during the last two years. Peace has not been proclaimed, and I do not see why this man should escape prosecution. The fact that he is a colored man should not entitled him to any special privilege. Having held a commission as an officer in the Army, he should be held to a stricter accountability than the man who was not so honored. I am loath to believe that he expresses the views of the intelligent negroes of America, but his uncontradicted statements should receive careful consideration from those who have looked with favor upon the organization of additional negro regiments with negro officers.

A possible explanation of the feeling of these negro officers is contained on page 21 of the May issue of The Crisis, where complaint is made that the issuance of an order prevented them from attending a dance where they could dance with white women. It is stated that at Vannes colored officers who composed the One hundred and sixty-seventh Detachment, attended several dances where they were entertained by and danced with French ladies of the town; that shortly thereafter an order was issued that no officer of that detachment would be permitted to attend a dance where a fee was charged. The complaint is that inasmuch as a fee was charged to all dances and all the officers of that particular detachment were negroes, the effect of the order was that they were denied the opportunity to dance with the white ladies of that town, while white officers of other detachments could continue to attend the dances.

When Du Bois is guilty of publishing stuff of this kind, it is not surprising to find William Munroe Trotter, editor of the Boston Guardian (negro), doing his utmost to incite riots and cause bloodshed. The New York Times of July 28 quotes him as stating in a speech made the day previous:

I told them in Paris that unless and until a concerted guaranty were given of citizenship based upon full democracy, with no distinction as to race or color, there could be no world peace, and in the same week of my arrival home my heart is made to swell within me because the new spirit of my own race taught the world that they refused to be shot down in the capital of Lincoln. While they were degrading us they were making our boys fight for them. Unless the white American behaves, he will find that in teaching our boys to fight for him he was starting something that he will not be able to stop.

At the same meeting the Reverend Mr. Bolden aroused considerable enthusiasm among his negro hearers by declaring—

If a million men must die for the cause, fight like h—, everyone.

Another distinguished speaker, Mr. Welbecon, according to the Times, stated:

The time to talk has ceased. If we would follow the constructive work the blacks did in Washington, we would be better off.

On the same day these statements were made the blacks began their destructive work in Chicago.

Trotter, in addressing an audience at the Metropolitan M. E. Church in Washington last week, declared, according to the Washington Eagle (negro) of August 16:

Washington was saved from a dreadful disgrace when the colored men were not driven out of the city, which was the ultimate aim of the white brutes. If it were the lawless element of our race that stopped the onslaught, then the others of us should hang our heads in disgrace. We have shown how we can, and will retaliate. The other race will think twice the next time before they strike a single blow. Innocent pedestrians were maltreated near the doors of the White House, while the President stood inside. Washington papers did all they could to stir up race antagonism. It was the fighting qualities of the negro who stayed in the streets that put an end to the trouble.

In his speech he also stated:

A new negro is facing the white man to-day—one who has been aroused by a consecutive number of insults. Instead of replying "Yes, dear sir," and "No, dear sir," a sharp "Indeed" or "Yes" is heard, as the case may be. There will be no peace until the white Americans learn to respect the rights of colored Americans.

This speech met with such approval of the editor of the Washington Eagle that headlines across the entire first page announced that "Trotter demands equal rights."

While these publications and the Challenge, edited by William Bridges, vie with each other in the publications of such incendiary stuff as I have read, the Messenger, edited by A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen, boasts that it is the only radical negro magazine in America, and does its utmost to prove that it is at least the most radical negro publication. It is printed upon paper of fine quality. It does not carry a half dozen advertisements other than its own advertisements, and it is evident that it is supported by contributions from some source. The material in the magazine would indicate that the source from which the support comes is antagonistic to the Government of the United States. It appeals for the establishment in this country of a Soviet government. It praises the treatment of the negro by the Germans as contrasted with the treatment accorded the negro by the allied forces. It urges the negro to join the I. W. W.'s; pays tribute to Debs and every other convicted enemy of the Government, and prays for the establishment of a Bolsheviki government in this land. It is evident that the I. W. W.'s are financing it in an effort to have the negro of America join them in their revolutionary plans. Under the headline, "Why negroes should join the I. W. W.," it states that 149,000 negroes engaged in railroad transportation do not belong to the Brotherhood organizations, and by joining the I. W. W.'s they could tie up the railroads as completely as could the Big Four Brotherhoods. Under the heading, "Negro police captains," the Messenger urges that negroes be made police captains in all large cities, and with a rare gift of prophecy announced in the July issue:

All such big negro communities are magazines of race prejudice dynamite, ready to explode at any moment upon putting the flame to the fuse. Riots are imminent—real race riots—in all such large cities as New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Chicago, Pittsburgh, and St. Louis.

* * * * * * *

We invite serious consideration of our proposals on this question. We wonder what mayor will have the courage, brains, and foresight to take the lead. Intelligent police captains will undoubtedly serve them well in the coming race conflicts which bid fair to sweep the country.

Since the publication of this magazine most unfortunate race riots have occurred in Washington and Chicago. In determining who was the aggressor, the above statements are enlightening. They show that the negro leaders had deliberately planned a campaign of violence.

The August issue of the Messenger boasts that it "is being read this month by over 30,000 negro workers and a few thousand radical whites," and referring to the I. W. W., says:

They (I. W. W.) are making a desperate effort to get the colored men into the one big union. The negroes are at least giving them an ear, and the prospects point to their soon giving them a hand. With the Industrial Workers' organization already numbering 800,000, to augment it with a million and a half or two million negroes would make it fairly rival the American Federation of Labor.

Now, let us see the nature of the appeal to which the negro is said to be giving an ear. On page 10 of the August issue of the Messenger you will find the following:

At the present time two forms of attack will suffice for negroes to enter upon. Whenever you hear talk of a lynching a few hundred of you must assemble rapidly and let the authorities know that you propose to have them abide by the law and not violate it. Offer your services to the mayor or the governor, pledging him that you can protect the life of any prisoner if the State militia has no such power. Ask the governor or the authorities to supply you with additional arms, and under no circumstances should you southern negroes surrender your arms for lynching mobs to come in and have sway. To organize your work a little more effectively, get in touch with all the negroes who were in the draft. Form little voluntary companies, which may quickly be assembled. Find negro officers who will look after their direction. Be perfectly calm, poised, cool, and self-contained. Do not get excited, but face your work with cold resolution, determined to uphold the law and protect the lives of your fellows at any cost. When this is done nobody will have to sacrifice his life or that of anybody else, because nobody is going to be found who will try to overcome that force.

Industrially, let the farmers organize farmers' protective unions. Let the lumber workers, molders, masons, plasterers, and other negro workers on railroads and in mines organize into unions, quietly and unostentatiously. Be prepared to walk out in concert, every man and woman who does any form of work. Let it be known that we are down to plain business, free from any foolishness or play.

Let every negro in the South begin to work on this program by agitating for it in the lodges, churches, schools, parlor and home conversation, and while at work in factory or field. Write also to us about any detail in entering upon this work. If this program is pressed, a year from now we can call out of the fields, the factories, and mines between a million and two million negroes, who will initiate the true work of making America a real "land of the free and home of the brave."

I will not burden you with further quotations from the negro press. These are sufficient to advise you of the evil forces at work. If upon the statute books there is now no law prohibiting the circulation through the mails of incendiary doctrines such as I have cited, then it is time that legislation is enacted to prohibit it. We can all believe in a free press, but we can recognize the distinction between a free press and a revolutionary and anarchistic press. For a long time we failed to realize the danger of permitting the publication of revolutionary doctrines in the foreign-language press. To-day they are under close surveillance, and in like manner we should now prevent the I. W. W. and the Bolsheviki of Russia from using the negro press of America to further their nefarious purposes.

I call these quotations from the negro press to the attention of the white men of America in order that they may know of the efforts that are being made to induce the negro to resort to violence.

I call attention to the statements of the negro press for the further purpose of expressing the hope that among the negro leaders there are men who care more for the future of their race than they do for their own personal ambition, and who will tell their people that in seeking political and social equality they are cherishing false hopes and are doomed to disappointment.

If the two races are to live together in this country it may as well be understood that the war has in no way changed the attitude of the white man toward the social and political equality of the negro. If as a result of his experience in the war he does not care to live in this land without political and social equality, then he can depart for any other country he wishes, and his departure will be facilitated by the white people of this country, who desire no disturbing factor in their midst. If by reason of his experience he seeks social and political equality with the white man, but refuses to consider leaving for parts where it will be willingly given to him, and cherishes the hope that by violence it can be gained here, he can not too quickly realize that there are in this country 90,000,000 white people determined not to extend political and social equality to the 10,000,000 negroes, and a resort to violence must inevitably bring to the negro the greater suffering.

If there is left in the race any sane leadership it should now be exerted to counteract the evil effects of the radicals. The negro must realize that his progress is dependent upon the assistance of the white man with whom he lives. In the South, where, in the opinion of uplifters, the negro is ill treated, the truth is that the negro is making rapid progress. He is accumulating money; he is buying property and educating his children. He lives in better homes and often travels in automobiles. His business opportunities are practically unlimited. He is protected in his life and property. He is happy and contented and will remain so if the propagandist of the I. W. W., the Bolsheviki of Russia, and the misguided theorist of other sections of this country will let him alone. I know that whenever a lynching takes place in the South it is heralded to the country as an evidence of barbaric oppression of the negro. Mob law is always indefensible and inexcusable. In the South lynchings are condemned by the press, the pulpit, and by public men who unceasingly urge reliance upon the courts. But notwithstanding all efforts, the fact is that whenever a negro commits an assault upon a white woman the white man does not reason. He acts. And only extraordinary efforts on the part of law officials will prevent a lynching.

I know that lynchings have occurred for provocations other than criminal assault, but I know, too, of many instances where law officers have died protecting prisoners against mob violence. I know that men who participated in lynchings have been convicted, and the law-abiding people of the South are doing their utmost to bring about a sentiment of upholding the law under all circumstances. But in mitigation rather than defense of the South in this matter it must be said that the mob very rarely, if ever, does violence to any but the guilty negro. It has never used the provocation of one criminal negro as an excuse for recklessly assailing the law-abiding negroes of the community. The mob may lynch the guilty man, but the law-abiding negro knows he is in no danger.

Another peculiar thing is that while the press of the North and the negro press will join the press and pulpit of the South in their condemnation of the criminality of the mob, they seldom join us in condemnation of the criminal assaults upon white women, which is generally the cause of the lynching.

Recently the Chicago newspapers asked the governors of the various Southern States whether employment could be provided for southern negroes who had recently gone to Chicago. The South can provide employment for every law-abiding negro who wishes to return. But for any negro who has become inoculated with the desire for political equality or social equality there is no employment in the South, nor is there any room for him in the South.

It is stated that most of the negroes who went to Chicago from the Southern States during the last few years were induced to go by employment leagues, who held out to them the hope of higher wages, better conditions, and social equality. The Chicago News, two days prior to the race riot, stated that each of these employment leagues published a newspaper which circulated in the South setting forth the advantage of conditions in that city. It is suggested that behind this propaganda was the desire of some politicians to enlarge their political influence by increasing the number of negro voters and the desire on the part of some capitalists to secure in the negro a prospective strike breaker and a lever to keep down the wages of the workingman. Whatever was the inspiration, the effect of the emigration of the negro to Northern States has been to make the negro problem a national instead of a sectional one.

It has been said that "the North has the principles, but the South has the negroes." To-day the North also has the negro, and with the coming of the negro many of its theories have departed. People of the North have come to realize that in the absence of daily contact with the negro they could believe in political and social equality of the races, but that whenever the negroes in any large number come into a community or State that belief is swept away by that which is greater than constitutional or legislative enactments, namely, the natural instinct of the Anglo-Saxon. No better evidence of this truth can be asked than the changed attitude of the northern press. For years the Chicago Tribune led the press of the North in criticism of the South because of its attitude toward the negro. It is interesting to-day to read in its editorial columns the following:

> We are swiftly getting to the point where our colored citizens must look the facts in the face. There will be no political injustice. There will be social differences. They need not be unjust. They do exist, and they will. The thinking negroes must use their influence with their race. They must realize the facts and conditions.

This ardent champion of negro rights now declares there will be social differences, and thus sustains the position of the white man of the South. They state, "There will be no political injustice." If by that is meant there will be no restriction of the exercise of the franchise by the negro, then I say to them that if they are honest they will say there will be no restriction in any community where the whites have an overwhelming majority. But I know that just as soon as in any northern community the negroes increase in number to such extent as to endanger the political control of the white man, just so soon will there be restriction of his right to vote, because this is a white man's country, and will always remain a white man's country. So much for political equality.

As to social equality, God Almighty never intended that a white race and a black race should live on terms of social equality, and that which the Creator did not intend man can not make possible.

Abraham Lincoln, in a speech delivered at Charleston, Ill., in 1858, declared:

> I am not nor ever have been in favor of bringing about in any way social and political equality of the white and black races; that I am not nor ever have been in favor of making voters or jurors of negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office, nor to intermarry with white people; and I will say in addition to this that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality. And inasmuch as they can not so live, while they do remain together there must be the position of superior and inferior, and I, as much as any other man, am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race.

This was the view of the great emancipator. And the view of Lincoln is the view of practically every man who has come into intimate contact with the negro and whose opinion is worthy of serious consideration.

Neither political equality nor social equality is essential to the happiness of the negro. The population of the congressional district I represent is about evenly divided between the races. In one county, however, there are seven or eight negroes to one white man, and, parenthetically, I might say that in that county there is less race trouble than in any county of the State. I know the negroes of my district do not seek to participate in politics. I know that they do not seek social equality. I know they do seek to better their condition and that the white man is daily aiding them in their progress. I know that if left alone they will continue contented, and I do not want these radical negro publications, whether supported by the I. W. W., the Bolsheviki of Russia, or the misguided theorist of the North, to be circulated among them, arousing the passions of the criminal class of negroes, and resulting in injury to the law-abiding negro as well as to the white people of the South. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for five minutes, or would the gentleman give me five minutes?

Mr. MAPES. I can not. I have more requests for time than I can grant.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for five minutes, not to come out of the time fixed for general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes, not to come out of the time fixed for general debate. Is there objection?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the House has fixed the time. I am obliged to call attention to that, and I have had so many requests for additional time that I could not grant that I am afraid I will have to object.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I ask the gentleman not to object. If he will let me take five minutes——

Mr. MAPES. The committee has no right to extend the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. MAPES. I make the point of order.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. And the gentleman will not yield me any time? He has not any time which he can yield?

Mr. MAPES. It is absolutely impossible.

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-seven Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. GARRETT (after a short pause in the proceedings). Mr. Chairman, what is the trouble? I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The trouble is that we have no tally clerk here to copy the roll.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the Chair was in doubt.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 28.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. MAPES and Mr. SEARS took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 50.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is present, and the committee decides to rise.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. REAVIS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 5818, for the retirement of public-school teachers in the District of Columbia, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of——

Mr. BEE. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will wait until the gentleman finishes the motion.

The gentleman moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman withhold that for a time until I ask unanimous consent that time for general debate be extended for 10 minutes?

Mr. MONDELL. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. I move that the House adjourn, if time can not be given to the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker——

The House divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 58.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. I do that because I think the gentleman from South Carolina should be given a little time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is in order. The gentleman makes the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAPES. Will the vote be had on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It will be on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, of course the motion to adjourn does not require a quorum.

The SPEAKER. No. A motion to adjourn does not require a quorum.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. A vote of the House to adjourn does not require a quorum, but a vote of the House not to adjourn, I submit to the Chair, does require a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair thinks the vote will come on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, may I be heard on the point of order?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. I am not particularly interested in the result of this motion to adjourn, but, with all possible deference, I am afraid the Speaker may have made a ruling that is somewhat misleading.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Texas made a motion to adjourn. Upon that the House divided. The Speaker announced the result. Whereupon the gentleman from Texas made the point that there was no quorum present.

Now, if the Speaker rests his decision on the proposition that he had announced the result, and that it was a settled matter, I should not be disposed to quarrel with the decision; but if the Speaker holds that merely because it does not take a quorum to adjourn, then if the point of order of the gentleman from Texas was made in time to require a vote, if it had been on some other proposition, I must dissent with the decision of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees with the gentleman. The Chair stated a moment later that the vote would come on the motion to adjourn, but, on reconsideration, the Chair thinks that the sequence of events was this: The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] moved to adjourn. The House voted down the motion to adjourn, and the Chair so put it. Then the gentleman made a point of no quorum.

Now, the only question is whether that point of no quorum was made on the division or subsequent to that. The Chair is inclined to think it was made on the division, and that the vote would come on the motion to adjourn. Obviously no quorum is present, and it is an automatic call of the House. As many as are in favor of the motion to adjourn will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay." The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 0, nays 242, answered "present" 3, not voting 185, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of District of Columbia business.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion I desire to submit the request for unanimous consent that I be allowed to address the committee for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to be allowed to address the Committee of the Whole for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there have been a great many requests on this side of the House for time to speak upon matters not pertaining to District business. I see no reason why the gentleman should not extend his remarks in the RECORD, the same as Members on this side will have to. Therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of District of Columbia business.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The ayes appear to have it, the ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too late.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rose immediately to ask for a division when the Chair was announcing the result.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not address the Chair until after the Chair had announced the result. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 5818, for the retirement of public-school teachers in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirteen minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina resumed and concluded the remarks printed above.

Mr. MAPES. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, with shoes at $16 a pair, steak at 60 cents a pound, eggs at 60 cents a dozen, sugar at 16 cents a pound, this gouging of the public must be stopped. The President after his return from his absorption in European affairs found the country in an uproar over the neglect of American affairs. He called Congress in joint session and made an adroit attempt to "pass the buck" to Congress, leaving the impression that Congress had neglected its duties; but the Senate committee finds that the President has been fully clothed for the last two years with authority to do everything necessary to stop unfair trade practices.

The new Attorney General has set the machinery of the Department of Justice at work. I have full confidence that he will exert great energy to bring the profiteers to book. I know him to be a capable, fearless, full-blooded American, even though he is a Democrat, and if additional legislation is necessary let us be prompt and give it to him, for we may feel sure that he will never abuse it. What a commentary it is upon the torpidity of the administration for the past two years. The former Attorney General, with all the machinery of the antitrust, antimonopoly legislation, with all the power of the Food Commission with which the President has been clothed to control the food supplies and the business of the country at his command, he did nothing. What a strange spectacle that the Secretary of War should have been found withholding from the market great stores of surplus food supplies, clothing textiles, lumber, automobiles, airplanes, for which the Government has no use, in the interest of the packers, the canners, and manufacturers. It is said there are 135,000 automobiles of various sorts standing out in the weather going to waste, and nobody can buy an auto except an auto manufacturer.

I do not impugn corrupt motives in this "stabilizing of the markets," but it was utterly stupid.

The smooth gentlemen who were interested in maintaining war prices just got around the Secretary and fixed their spectacles on his nose so that he could see things the way they wanted them to be seen. However, if the whole stock were equally distributed as a gift nobody would get much, and perhaps in making this nonpartisan speech I should not mention it at all. Its great significance lies in the exhibit made of the attitude of the Secretary of War toward big business.

I listened to the eloquent speech of the honorable gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] about a week ago, and he certainly convinced himself that the Democratic Party had won the Great War. He had to his complete satisfaction demonstrated its efficiency, its economy, its wisdom, and its infallibility in everything that had been done, and all this great work was performed by the Democratic Party in spite of the obstruction of the bad Republican Party. The honorable gentleman was really eloquent—he always is—and when it comes to handing out words the Democratic orators, from the Great Chief down, have no equal, but they all seem to be a bit "touchy" if you so much as suggest that the Democratic Party might have made a mistake here or have been extravagant there, and if you dare to mention "inefficiency" it is just like poking a stick into a cage of wild animals.

Another gifted orator, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH], took great pains to show the efficiency and economy of the Democratic Party. He stated that the dysentery that had scourged the Union Army in the Civil War and the typhoid that claimed so many victims in the Spanish-American War had been rendered practically negligible in the World War, and by inerrant logic proved the great efficiency of the Democratic Party by calmly ascribing the advances in surgery and medicine in the last 60 years to the Democratic efficiency. Now, I do not object to the Democrats standing out for their own notions. Every one of them is ready to fight at the drop of the hat when criticism of their party is made. I must confess to a fondness for men who will stand up. I hope I do not exceed the limits of mild criticism of these gentlemen who are so genial and as Democrats so pugnacious in saying that they have never learned that the great Republic is bigger than the Democratic Party and bigger than any State in it.

All the orators in the world can not disguise the fact that the Republican Party when in the minority supported the President's war measures as well as his own party did, and for the first time in the history of this country the minority party has supported the administration in a war, which the Democrats should bear in mind when they are disposed to blow their skins full of vainglory.

The confusion and extravagance and waste and hysteria that are incident to war are still upon us, and the restoration to normal conditions is the supreme task. Unnecessary interference with private business is a great mistake and to cripple private initiative is a tragedy.

Under the emergency of war the Government may do almost any necessary thing, but we are now in an emergency of tremendous portent, and if technically we are still at war there is ample authority to take prompt and drastic action in bringing the business of the country back to sanity and the profiteers to task.

Much of the high cost of living is due to extravagance and waste that is country wide. One of my youngsters spends as much for his living in a month as I did at his age in six months, and he earns his own living, too. Our habits have become reckless and extravagant. The housewife who used to go to the markets and carefully look over her purchases before "toting" them home, now has the hired girl telephone the dealer to send this, that, or the other thing, possibly a few pounds at a time, and the grocer sends his motor truck around with the purchase.

When workmen in shoe factories, in the shipyards, and munition plants were getting from $12 to $20 a day, of course it led to extravagance and profiteering all along the line. Of course prices rose higher and higher, and, of course, the general run of people who get no such wages find it hard or impossible to make both ends meet.

The Government itself was the greatest offender in bringing these conditions about. It taught the country the art of profiteering. It paid fabulous wages to workmen—three or four times as much as they had ever received before. Its cost-plus contracts, its improvident yielding to absurd prices and unreasonable demands, were perhaps excusable under the stress of war, but its wild orgy of extravagance spread to all the people. The business man and the farmer had to compete with the Government for labor and materials, and prices rose higher and higher, encouraging speculation and profiteering.

Some of the causes of high prices we can not escape, but this strange compound of fire and clay that we call "man" is prone to develop queer streaks of hoggishness, and while the Government should lay its hand as lightly as possible upon legitimate business it should strike down with a mailed fist monopoly, profiteering, trade discriminations, and unfair practices, and these are contributory causes of the high cost of living which law can remedy.

The packers have an iron grip upon the meat supplies and are gradually taking over the grocery trade. With their "peddler" refrigerating cars they enjoy large discriminations in railroad freights that others do not enjoy, and they are gradually driving the wholesale grocer out of the market. Fish, eggs, hides, leather, rice, beans, canned goods, canned salmon they already practically monopolize. Since prohibition is enacted they have taken up the grape-juice business and now furnish the soda-water plants.

Perhaps shoes and clothing show the clearest evidence of plain gouging. It has been stated on the floor that workmen in the shoe factories get as high as $140 a week. One of my colleagues told me that his wife had paid $16 for a pair of shoes, and he saw the name of the manufacturer on the shoe, and happening to be acquainted with him out of curiosity he wrote asking him what price he sold those shoes at, and he told him $8; excusing himself for charging $8 for a little bit of a pair of shoes, he said that he was paying his workmen from $15 to $20 a day and had had four strikes in the last four months.

Sugar dealers have been gouging the people. Gouging begins with the refiners. The wholesalers add so much more, and the retailers finish the job—not all of them, for some retailers are only charging 11 cents, while others are charging 16 cents. The refiners are under contract to charge not more than 9 cents per pound. The excuse is that they can not refine the raw sugar as fast as it is wanted, but this is merely an excuse. In the second year of the war we supplied ourselves and exported 815,000 tons of refined sugar, charging the foreign trade 4.9 cents per pound. In the third year of the war we exported 624,000 tons at 6.2 cents per pound. The last year of the war we exported 288,000 tons of sugar at 6.9 cents per pound. Now, there was no complaint in those years of lack of refining capacity when the refiners were exporting such vast quantities of sugar at from 2 to 2½ cents per pound less than they were charging our own people. The whole scheme is to get up a scare about shortage as the prelude to a rise in price, which the refiners have announced to begin January 1 next. The recent discussion of the sugar business by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN] is so full and conclusive that I respectfully urge the Members to make a study of it, for it shows that our domestic producers are not at fault for the profiteering in that commodity.

Cold storage, originally a most excellent device for saving food, has been made a rascally scheme for profiteering and keeping up prices the year round.

Formerly when the hens were on the job in the spring and summer eggs were plentiful, but about Christmas time the hens struck and eggs became scarce and we had to pay 25 and 30 cents per dozen for eggs, but cold storage was devised to carry over the surplus spring production so that we might have eggs the year round at perhaps 20 cents per dozen.

But as the system works out now, you pay 40 to 70 cents per dozen the year round, and cold storage makes Christmas prices every day of the year.

It has been the custom with many smart dealers when the market is oversupplied to destroy the surplus, so as to prevent its coming onto the market and disturbing prices, and the cold-storage business has been used to precisely that same purpose, and there ought to be legislation to require them to clean out their stocks after a given period of storage.

And it is just the same thing with fruits. Take bananas, for example. The importations are controlled by a few concerns, and the retailers all over the country are compelled to exact extortionate prices, and then add something on their own account.

Oh, cigars! A Lancaster County "Havana" sold for 5 cents. When an additional Government tax of $1 per 1,000 was imposed, many dealers at once raised the price to 6 cents, thereby collecting $10 per thousand additional to pay the Government tax of $1.

There is another matter to which I wish to call the attention of the House. There is a still growing tendency to leave the farm. At the time of the last census the rural population was 53.7 per cent, but it is now estimated that the census of 1920 will show not over 45 per cent living on the farms; and this, I believe, includes all those living in towns of less than 2,500 population.

We have, also, in consequence of the growing tendency to leave the farm a steady decrease in the production of foodstuffs in proportion to population.

This fact shows that high prices are in part due to the decrease in the production of foodstuffs, for which the only remedy is increased activity on the farms.

No legislation that we can devise will prevent the price of necessaries rising when the demand is greater than the supply. Law can not change a deficit into a surplus. But law can prevent an actual surplus from being changed into an apparent scarcity through the machinations of conscienceless profiteers. And, by the way, if there is any real scarcity, an embargo on part of our enormous exports will help some.

I do not agree with the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess] that the deflation of the currency is a remedy or even desirable. It would, indeed, reduce the prices, but at a fearful cost. When money is plentiful, everything that is measured in money is high in price. When money is only half as hard to get, commodities measured in money will double in price. There is a powerful reason against the deflation of our currency, which is yet as sound as a nut. When the bills are all marshaled we will owe about $24,000,000,000. This enormous debt in the last analysis must be paid in the products of labor.

If it were to be paid in wheat, for instance, when wheat is worth $2 a bushel, it would require 12,000,000,000 bushels.

But if we were to deflate the currency to the prewar standard of about $37 per capita, and wheat should fall to its prewar price of $1 per bushel, it would require twice as much wheat to pay the debt; or, in other words, the tax rate remaining the same, the farmer would have to raise twice as much wheat, or the workman would have to do twice as much work, to raise the money to pay his taxes. Low prices all around makes debt harder to pay, whether it is public or private debt. So I do not regard low prices as desirable, for low prices inevitably mean that labor is at a low valuation.

The times in this country are never better than when money and credit are in full volume, so that the productive energies of the country can be fully employed. When money is scarce, industry languishes, capital can not be secured to carry on business, and times are hard.

The corollary of great business activity and a redundant currency is high prices.

The enormous energies put forth by the workers at home when 4,000,000 men were drawn from production to become consumers and destroyers of wealth indicates clearly what this country could accomplish in time of peace if the country were set to work with the same energy. So, clearly, the greatest problem before this Congress is to establish conditions so that the people may actively engage in productive industry.

In order to do this a large circulating medium must be available. The wages paid will naturally be high, for when everybody can get a job labor is high. Capital must have an adequate return to induce it to undertake the risk of new enterprises.

We have about 30,000,000 workers in productive industries. Their industry on the farms and in the shops and factories produces about $90,000,000,000 of products annually.

Probably 80 per cent of this enormous volume is expended in the cost of production and the subsistence of the country, leaving about $18,000,000,000 to be added to the wealth of the country annually, and if 10 per cent of this were applied to payment of the war debt we could pay it all off in about 13 years. The illustration may not be exact, but it serves to show the enormous power that resides within the grasp of the American people.

What, then, is the situation?

The Government can suppress monopolies, profiteering, and unfair trade practices, if in no other way, by taxing them out of existence.

It can set the example of thrift and economy by cutting out the waste and extravagance that are now in every department.

It can pay wages that will afford subsistence on the American scale of living, and it can discharge the bench warmers and idlers that swarm in every department.

Another good plan, in my opinion, would be to enact a tariff that would shut out all manufactured goods that can be made in this country, because every dollar's worth of them that comes here displaces so much American labor; and I congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, whom I always supposed was a free trader of the strictest Democratic sect, who has introduced a bill imposing a tariff of $40 a ton on Mexican graphite. I congratulate him. He is beginnng to see the light; but like all recent converts, he is radical He is putting his tariff on raw material. I wonder if the gentleman whom he so eloquently lauds as the "greatest man in the world" would veto the bill? The protective-tariff bill was knocked out in 1913 to reduce the high cost of living, and the usual results of nonemployment and stagnation promptly followed, and the high cost of living kept a climbing.

The war coming on in 1914 saved the country from this unwise policy, because it set our industries at work and relieved the country from the torpor and distress caused by the Underwood tariff law. That law should be repealed, and not graphite only but all other American industries should be put back under a protective tariff.

But when all this is done the real problem is still before us.

To increase wages without a corresponding increase in the price of everything into which labor enters would not be fair nor possible, and an increase all around would only be traveling in a circle, getting us nowhere.

We may expect high prices. Wages will never go back to the old scales.

There is only one way to support high wages, and that is by the employment of the high efficiency of American effort in production.

We were in war. We are paying the price. The aftermath is bitter. Half-baked doctrines of alien fanatics in the name of liberty would pull down the temple.

Let us hold firm in the American fashion. This is no time for hysteria or new-fangled doctrines of foreign importation.

The big job of Congress is to clear the decks so that the people can get to work. Make the things that people need plenty in the country, arrange distributions so that labor gets its equitable share, and the job is done.

Let the people be assured that the Government still lives, devoted not to any class but to the welfare of all the people, and the lowering skies will clear before the rising sun of prosperity.

Another problem is the railroad question. Organized labor demands that the Government shall buy the railroads and give them to the unions and railway operators to run.

I have always been in favor of the labor union. Collective bargaining is the only defense the workingman has against the inevitable tendency under the competitive system to reduce the wages to the lowest point of subsistence. Although the union has done many things to cause its friends to be ashamed, I have seen it steadily become less selfish, more reasonable; and I have always believed it would become so fair, so enlightened, that every workingman would find it to his advantage to join.

But I deeply regret to see a movement promulgated in the name of organized labor to form a political party composed of a class, to advance the interests of its own special class.

Political stratification of the country into classes would be fatal to democratic government.

The farmers' political party, the railroaders' political party, the Catholic political party, the Presbyterian political party, the bankers, the clerks, the manufacturers, the bakers, the steel workers, all in their own political party, insistent that the country shall be run for their class, would see the death of democracy.

But if it is one man's right to join the union, it is another man's right to stay out of it if he chooses. I have no sympathy with any man or set of men who will use intimidations and threats, the bludgeon and the torch, to prevent another man from working at such wages as suits him. I know the argument that "the nonunion man who works practically fixes the scale which the union man gets for his work," and I recognize the force of it. But the brains and the brawn and the ability of every man is his own.

In this Government, dependent as it is on the independence and self-reliance and freedom of its citizens, I regard it as of the very highest importance that every citizen shall be left free to do with his own labor what he chooses, free from all threats, intimidation, or violence. I have no seasoning of the commune in my blood, and the appeal of organized labor for right and justice will never reach the American heart by threats, intimidation, or violence.

But the old relations of capital and labor, called in our law books the relations of "master and servant," have undergone a profound change. Thoughtful men everywhere admit that every essential human element in production is entitled to a voice in the division of the joint product of capital and labor, and the insistence that labor has as much right to say what share of the joint product capital shall have as capital has to say what labor shall have is the very marrow of labor organization. And "high wages," which is only another name for a more equitable division of the products of labor, have come to stay.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there for one question?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I can not gather from the gentleman's arguments pro and con whether he is for or against the Plumb plan of turning over the railroads to the union men.

Mr. HULINGS. I will answer the gentleman in a moment. I do not believe in Government ownership or in any scheme that looks in that direction. I believe the railroads should go back into the hands of the owners, but under such control that overcapitalization, destructive competition, unjust discriminations, and the rascally manipulations of former years shall be made impossible. They should be allowed such combinations and coordination of effort and facilities as operation by the Government has proved to be indispensable.

Mr. BAER. Do you think you can give the railroads back if you insist upon that condition?

Mr. HULINGS. In my opinion the directorate of the railroad companies and, as well, all our public utilities should represent the owners who furnish the capital, the employees who do the work, and the public who are so vitally interested in the proper management of the business.

Branch regional interstate commerce commissions should be authorized to fix living rates for its particular region according to the needs of the roads in that region, subject to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the courts.

This would preserve private initiative, which is the lifeblood of enterprise. It would prevent strikes by giving the operatives an equal voice with the owners in fixing wages.

But, gentlemen, whatever we do let us remember that we are here to legislate for the general welfare of the whole people and not for the special interest of any particular class. There is no royal road to prosperity. Thrift, frugality, honesty, industry, directed and guided by sound common sense, is the only safe road.

The Congress has an arduous task in restoring and rehabilitating our industries, and if we can provide scope for the mighty energies of the great Republic and harness the brain and brawn of our people in fraternal effort in developing our great resources, the payment of the war debt will be a bagatelle and prosperity will preside in every industrious household. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, how much time does the gentleman yield back?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has six minutes and the gentleman from Kentucky has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. MAPES. I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he will not use the balance of his time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to pluck many feathers out of the tail of the American eagle upon this occasion, but rather I shall confine myself chiefly to the discussion of this teachers' pension bill. I believe that the laborer is worthy of his hire, but I do not believe that it should come in the shape of a pension. I believe that it is wrong in principle and leads to habits of extravagance. There is but one class of people that I will vote to pension, and that is the soldier who in the Civil War risked his life for his country at $13 a month and the soldier who in this war risked his life at $30 a month.

I believe that school-teachers of the District and elsewhere should have adequate compensation, if they are not getting it now. And if they are not, I am willing to vote for a bill to place their salaries on a proper basis, but I will not vote to give them a pension.

I asked the gentleman who has charge of this bill—Mr. MAPES, of Michigan—if he could give any reason why the school-teachers in Washington City should have a pension and the farmers and the coal miners and the carpenters and the laborers should not have one, and he has not answered that question yet, and he can not answer it.

Now, if there is any class of people in this country at all, outside of the soldiers, who should have a pension, it is the farmer, because he is the man that at present is feeding the world. I am opposed to his feeding the world. I want him to feed America, and he is going to do it. [Applause.]

I never voted nor will I ever vote to send food to the people of Europe until they quit fighting and quarreling among themselves and go to work, which they will not do as long as this country will make donations of food and money to them. [Applause.]

You talk about the high cost of living, and feeding Europe is one of the great reasons of the high cost of living in this country. [Applause.]

This Congress has been in session now a little over three months, and our Republican friends insisted that the President of the United States should call Congress into session so that they could relieve the distress of the country and the high cost of living. What has been accomplished? You have taken the tax off ice cream and soda water [laughter on the Democratic side] and lost this last year, on that basis, $21,000,000 in revenue, and next year you will lose $100,000,000 in revenue if that bill is passed by the Senate.

You have all seen the cartoon "Bringing up Father, Jiggs and Maggie." I noticed the other day that Jiggs and Maggie were at the seashore. Jiggs was in a bathing suit, and he wanted to go and see Dinty Moore, and he made his escape in a flying machine. He landed at Dinty Moore's place and went in and shook hands with the gang and said, "Where is Dinty?" "Why," they replied, "he is in the back room learning to drink soda water." [Laughter.]

And since we have got prohibition so many people will have to learn to drink soda water that that tax on soda, if properly laid, will amount to $100,000,000.

Now, gentlemen, you know, according to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, that this Government to-day is $30,000,000,000 in debt, and yet not only this Congress but the last Congress voted money out of the Public Treasury, which must be paid in taxes by the people of the United States, like a lot of drunken sailors, and you are still keeping it up.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. We are operating in committee and the time would have to be extended in the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TEMPLE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bill of the following title:

On August 25, 1919:

H. R. 6323. An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes.

RETIREMENT OF SCHOOL-TEACHERS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak in reference to a matter having to do with the District of Columbia. It is in relation to the conditions as they exist to-day at the Union Station. We hear a great deal at the present time about monopoly. If there ever was an exhibition of a monopoly it is in the manner in which the space is set apart at the Union Station. I do not know the exact relation between the so-called Terminal Co., which, I believe, constructed the station, and the Terminal Taxicab Co., but if the Terminal Co., the owners of the station, control the approaches to the station certainly the Terminal Taxicab Co. is owned by the same party.

I am very glad, indeed, that the chairman of the District Committee has introduced a resolution investigating the various things in the District of Columbia, and including in the resolution the conditions as set forth that have to do with the Terminal Co.

Let me tell the committee the conditions. Every man in this room and every citizen of the District who has to patronize the station will readily see the situation. At the front of the station where the main entrance is you can not get in. There are three roadways there and two car tracks, one line of cars going up and the other down, or east and west, whichever way you wish to call it, but the public can not get to the front of the station by conveyance, because it is roped off on both sides of the entrance. At the further end—I should call in the north, but perhaps my geography is wrong, at any rate at one end of the station—you can not drive in without having staring you in the face of a sign making you feel almost like a criminal because you do not patronize the taxicabs of the Terminal Taxicab Co.

On both sides of the entrance at this section of the station there is a sign stating that the space there is reserved for the Terminal Taxicab Co., and when you get in under the archway, the one approach to the station itself, there is a sign which says that that line is reserved for the taxicabs of the Terminal Taxicab Co., and the public can take anything that is left. You can walk across the greasy path that is left by the taxicabs and get along the best you know how.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. In just a moment. As you come to the station there is a large section which formerly was reserved for local parking for the benefit of individuals, but that is now reserved for the standing cabs of the Terminal Taxicab Co. One whole half, practically, of all that end of the station is filled with the cars of the Taxicab Co., standing there three deep, and when you apply for a cab in there you are told that you can not get one unless you take one of that particular company. I now yield to my colleague from Massachusetts.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I was about to ask if this has happened more particularly since the railroad has been under the control of the Government and the station with it.

Mr. TREADWAY. It has, because it has only been in existence for the past two or three months. You could get to the front door of the station until quite recently, but now there is an order positively forbidding any passing through. I went there yesterday at one end of the station and tried to go along to the other end as anyone ordinarily would like to do with a car. I saw this sign staring me in the face, "No admittance," or "This way out," or something of that kind, and I left my car at a place where they said you could not park, took the chance of arrest by leaving it there in order that I might ask an officer whether there was any way to get to the other end of the station. He said there was not unless I should go out around the fountain. That is the exact answer I received.

The public has two opportunities there to park cars—at each end of the station, away from the ticket office, away from the waiting room, away from everything. In other words, the public is being treated as Mr. Vanderbilt said once it should be in relation to its rights, and the people who are doing it are evidently the Terminal Taxicab Co. and the Terminal Co., who are working hand in hand. I do not know whose fault this is, but as this is District day it seems to me a good time and place to call it to the attention of some one. I make this statement, and it can be verified by every Member on the floor, that you can not get in a conveyance at the front door of the station of the city of Washington, and you can not get a taxicab under this particular section, unless you want to patronize the monopoly which the Terminal Co. establishes, and you can not park your own car to get into the station and buy a ticket, or a sandwich, or any of the various things that a man wants to do who goes to a station, unless you go away at either end from the station in the most inconvenient places possible. I submit this matter to the Committee of the Whole in the hope that there may be just a little bit of attention paid to the wishes of the public regarding the use of the station.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. All time having expired, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That within 60 days after the passage of this act there shall be deducted and withheld from the basic salary of every teacher in the public schools of the District of Columbia an amount computed to the nearest tenth of a dollar that will be sufficient, with interest thereon at 4 per cent per annum, compounded annually, to purchase, under the provisions of this act, an annuity equal to 1 per cent of his average annual basic salary received since the passage of public act No. 254, approved June 20, 1906, for each year of his whole term of service, payable monthly throughout life, for every such teacher who shall be retired as herein provided.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, how is this bill to be read—by paragraph or by section?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, my understanding of the rule is that only general appropriation bills are ever read by paragraphs, and all other bills are read by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is correct.

Mr. CANNON. Is not this an appropriation bill?

Mr. MAPES. This is not what is known as a general appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. I have not had time to read the bill, but the report says that it carries an appropriation of $50,000. If that does not make it an appropriation bill, what would?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes the rule with reference to the reading of bills by paragraphs applies only to the regular general appropriation bills, and holds that the present bill will be considered by sections rather than by paragraphs.

Mr. CANNON. Were points of order reserved on the bill?

Mr. MADDEN. You do not have to reserve the points of order. The gentleman can make them.

Mr. CANNON. I am not so sure about that.

The CHAIRMAN. This is not a bill that was reported from the floor of the House, and for that reason points of order are not required to be reserved.

Mr. CANNON. Then an amendment would not be in order until we reach the end of the section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think so. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The deductions herein provided for shall be based on such annuity table as the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct, and shall be varied yearly to correspond to any change in the basic salary of the teacher: Provided, however, That said deductions shall in no case exceed 8 per cent of his annual basic salary: And provided further, That when the basic salary exceeds $1,500 the deductions shall be made as on a basic salary of $1,500.

The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be filed with the board of education on September 10 of each year a certificate showing the amount of deduction to be made from the salary of each teacher during the year, said deduction to be made in 10 equal amounts, one to be deducted each school month. A similar certificate shall be filed not later than the 15th day of each calendar month to cover cases of new entrants. No deduction shall be made from less than an entire month's salary.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I very much regret that my duties elsewhere in the committee room have been such that I have to hop, skip, and jump at what this bill means. For the first time to-day I have had my attention directed to it. I want to say that in my judgment this is a bad time for the Congress of the United States to legislate for the purpose of pensioning civil employees of the Government [applause], and this amounts to a pension. The bill provides that a certain percentage shall be retained from the salary of the teacher to go into the Treasury, the Government to contribute its share, one-half. That is a little bit of camouflage, because in the not distant future if this bill is enacted the Government will pay all of the civil pensions. There are 110,000,000 of us in the country, how many employees in the civil service I do not know, but some one has said 600,000, though I think there are more than that.

Now, I want to say—I measure my words when I do say it—that, taking the country by and large, great blocks of people are hungering and thirsting to get upon the governmental rolls, and competent people, too. Washington is a very attractive place. You begin here upon the teachers. The teachers are a very desirable set of people, and I have every sympathy with them. But now they are to be rated at $1,500 a year, and if they do not get $1,500 a year my impression is, and I beg to be corrected if the impression is wrong, that they are getting the average pay of $1,500. Mr. Chairman, as the value of the dollar decreases in its purchasing capacity I voted for the bonus for the Government employees and that included the teachers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, they are no worse off than other Government employees—over 600,000—in the civil service; possibly more than that, or at least that. Now, the time comes when that 600,000 will desire to be pensioned. I recall when I was a kid that it was the rallying cry of both Whigs and Democrats, they agreed about it; they said, "We are opposed to civil pensions." The census of 1900, I think, showed the average salary of preachers of this country to be $600 a year. They have got to contribute their share to pay these civil pensions. So, taking the whole country of 110,000,000 of people, if you enter upon a system of Government civil pensions, how can you be consistent if you call upon the remainder of the population who do not hold official positions to pay the favored officeholders pensions?

Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of Members that we enacted the war-risk law. I voted for that law and am glad of it. Under its provisions those in the military service took in the aggregate $40,000,000,000 of insurance. The loss which has already been adjusted is $800,000,000, and we will keep all the pledges we made to the soldiers.

Mr. Chairman, the dollar, by inflation of the currency since the commencement of the war, has depreciated in its purchasing capacity on the average one-half, or to put it in another way, 50 cents. This would purchase as much as $1 will purchase now. As the purchasing power of the dollar increases as we get back to normal conditions the cost of production, as measured by the dollar, will decrease.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Will Congress ever reduce any salary or any bonus that we have ever granted during this war?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will say to my friend that when cotton sells for 6 cents a pound and corn at 40 cents a bushel and wheat at 70 cents a bushel and hogs at $4.50 to $5 a hundred and cattle at the same price, yes; but you can not, and there is no political party that can exist and be continued in power that will not. As the value of a dollar increases in its purchasing capacity and everything decreases then there will be in the fullness of time an adjustment that is apt and proper.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope so.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I have faith in the Republic. I have faith in the capacity of our people to maintain the Republic. God knows there is not a nerve in my body or a muscle in my body but does not cry aloud that we are competent for self-government. The majority rules. In conclusion, that is about all I want to say. I can not make up my mind as this entering wedge comes, and there are multiplied thousands of people to try to follow after, as the agitation grows that civil employees are to be pensioned. I can not get my consent to vote for this bill. On the contrary, when it comes to a vote I shall follow my best judgment and vote against the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HAYS. Mr Chairman, as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia I have given much thought to this bill and am heartily in favor of its passage. The bill is called the teachers' retirement bill; it provides an old-age income for the men and women who have grown gray in the service of their country. Briefly stated, this measure proposes that when a teacher has spent the active portion of his life in the schoolroom he is subject to retirement at the age of 62 years; in cases of physical disability retirement is allowed at an earlier age; in other cases where the teacher has retained his active faculties beyond the age of 62, his retirement may be deferred to a later date. But when the period of retirement does come, at whatever age, the salary stops and the pension begins. The pension is to be graduated according to the length of service rendered and according to the average salary earned by the teacher during his period of employment. The fund out of which these pensions are to be paid comes in part from monthly assessments against the teachers themselves during their earning years, while the balance of the fund is an outright Government appropriation. Let it be understood that no pension paid under this plan is to be regarded as a public charity; this contribution is not in any sense a gift to the teachers, but on the other hand it is only a deferred recompense for services already performed. Primarily the bill under consideration to-day deals with the teachers in the District of Columbia; but secondarily, and in a much larger sense, the principle to be established by this Federal legislation will be a guiding pattern for general State legislation and will give encouragement to the various Commonwealths of the Union to enact similar laws. In my early life I had some experience as a teacher, and ever since that time I have given careful study to questions relating to that profession. I know that no other calling among mankind, save perhaps the clergy, has contributed and is contributing so much to the welfare of humanity as that noble army of men and women who devote their lives to the cause of education.

This Government is not, in theory, a government by the few; it is a government by the whole people; the people rule, because our sovereignty rests with the American voter. Therefore, in order that the people, who are, in fact, the Government, may govern themselves intelligently, it is necessary that the people be educated. In a Republic like ours the strength of the Government lies in the strength of the people; and the strength of the people is measured by their capacity to deal understandingly with the great questions that must be solved by their ballots. In order that the people of America may be properly educated, it is necessary that our school system be the best that we can make it. Handsome buildings, beautiful grounds, elegant libraries, splendid laboratories, fine gymnasiums, historic museums, convenient furniture, artistic paintings, and classic sculpture are all useful and needful accessories in our system of education. But more fundamental than all of these, and vastly more important to the success of our system, is the teacher who presides over the destiny of our boys and girls. It would be hard to exaggerate the tremendous influence exercised by the teacher upon the plastic minds of our children in their school days. It is in youth that impressions are received which do not fade away. In later years we accept ideas with the proverbial grain of salt; but in youth our impressions become indelible. How often does a child look upon his teacher as the ideal of human character and the perfection of human wisdom. In many instances the teacher molds and shapes the life of the child more completely than its parents. During the formative period of the life of the coming citizen the schoolroom is vastly more than a place where books are read and lessons recited. It is a home; it is a church; it is a government; it is a world. There it is that character is formed; there it is that lifetime conceptions of moral principle take root; there it is that patriotic devotion to flag and country receives its first quickening impulse; there it is that the curtain is drawn aside, revealing in panoramic sequence the hopes and ambitions along the prospective pathway of life. From the sacred surroundings of the old schoolhouse begins the flight of childish fancy to the uttermost ends of the earth.

For the parents of America I demand that the teaching force of our Nation shall be composed of the best blood and brain our citizenship affords. But such exacting demands would be unfair if we did not seek to recompense the people from whom we ask so much. The only way to induce the best men and women to enter the schoolroom, and to remain there, is to standardize their profession. During the whole history of the public-school system the teaching profession has been the stepping-stone to some more remunerative calling.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I will.

Mr. HULINGS. How would the gentleman consider a plan of paying school-teachers a sufficient salary so that they could buy their own insurance if they chose?

Mr. HAYS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Gen. HULINGS, has asked if relief could not be afforded by raising the salary of the teacher. In answer to that question I admit that a substantial salary increase would go a long distance toward putting the teaching business on the same basis as other professions, but it would not do all that is necessary to be done. It is a notorious fact that school-teachers are the poorest paid employees to-day in either public or private service. A doctor may make $6,000 a year and complain that his practice is only a moderate one; yet I ask where is the public-school teacher who would not regard that sum as a princely income? A lawyer may make as much money as the doctor makes, and in some cases perhaps more. A shrewd business man may drive his bargains with the trade and in a little while he is the owner of a store and a home, and has a generous bank account. The average salary of the grade teachers in our public schools is less than $800 per year. In the city schools the janitor makes more money than the grade teacher. Unskilled manual labor in every line of industry draws a higher wage than our grade teachers. Manual labor requiring some degree of skill is paid for in salaries from three to four times as high as the teacher receives for shaping the lives of the oncoming generation.

And all the while it costs the school-teacher just as much for coal to warm the house as it costs the doctor; it costs the teacher the same price for bacon and eggs that it costs the lawyer; it costs the teacher just as much to ride on the train as the commercial traveler has to pay; it costs the teacher as much for shoes and hats at it costs the clerk in the Government office. More is asked of the teacher and less is given in return than is the case with any other occupation. No man or woman should be permitted to enter the schoolroom as a teacher unless endowed with a good education, a character of high integrity, a clean conception of morals, and a general fitness to safeguard child welfare. And in my observance the instances are exceedingly rare where the teacher has failed to measure up to these requirements. An increase in pay would in some measure relieve the unfortunate conditions that now prevail in the teaching profession. And I, for one, am in favor of seeing the school-teachers of the Nation, and particularly the grade teachers, more highly paid than they are to-day. But the question of salary is not involved in this bill, and even if it were it would not fully solve the problem for us. In these strenuous days of the high cost of living even a generous salary is no guaranty against the future. The ordinary income is exhausted by expense that occurs from day to day, and little can be put aside for the future.

I want to see these teachers relieved from the haunting fear of poverty when time has laid its heavy hand upon them; I want every man and woman who teaches my child and yours to live wholly in the present cheered with the confident knowledge that when the winter of life has come the wolf will not invade the kitchen door.

There are many noble men and women who are particularly gifted as teachers and who love the work of leading and training the youthful mind. But in a little while the profession looses them; their very worth and fitness bring them invitations to enter some more remunerative line of endeavor. They quit the schoolroom, not because they do not like its atmosphere, not because they are unfit for service there, not because some other occupation is more alluring, not because their surroundings elsewhere are more congenial; but they leave the schoolroom reluctantly and wholly for the sake of insuring a competence against the rainy day that befalls all of us.

The gentleman from Kentucky—Judge THOMAS—protests against the teachers' pension law and asks why the farmer is not equally entitled to Government reward. But I have answered his question by showing that the farmer and the mechanic and all other people engaged in private occupations of a gainful nature have more abundant opportunities for laying aside ample protection against adversity. The teacher is not engaged in private work. The teacher is a public servant devoting 100 per cent of effort to the well-being of humanity; the teacher is engaged in making young America fit for citizenship and in making the world a safe place in which to live.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I will.

Mr. THOMAS. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether he thinks George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, William McKinley, and other people I could name, were not educated into good citizenship at a time when teachers did not have pensions?

Mr. HAYS. Yes, the gentleman from Kentucky is right; those distinguished statesmen that he has named were educated into good citizenship by the school-teachers of America. That fact proves the contention I have been making that we owe to this profession a debt of gratitude that can not be paid in money. In those days the teachers in country schools rarely received more than $25 per month for their services. They, like the present generation of teachers, were courageous men and women who did not teach school with the avaricious hope of accumulating wealth; they taught school because they believed that they could render their best service to humanity by developing the boys and girls of that time into fitness for national and world leadership. Just how well the teachers of that day succeeded in their worthy endeavor is illuminated by the question that the gentleman from Kentucky has asked. We do not know how those teachers fared when their hair grew white and their eyes were dim as they tottered to the end of their pathway. But how gracious it would have been if a grateful Republic had in some measure lightened their burden in recognition of their splendid service to civilization.

Gentlemen, let us pass this bill; let us encourage the various States to enact similar legislation; let us say to that devoted army of men and women who are laboring for mankind that we appreciate their devotion to duty; let us help standardize their profession; let this Government acknowledge the fundamental principle of justice that the laborer is worthy of his hire. I am in favor of a pension system for the teachers of the District of Columbia and for every State in the American Union. I am in favor of better pay for the teachers. I appreciate the arduous, toilsome, nerve-racking ordeals of their labor. I realize the immeasurable good they are doing for humanity.

I understand why so many of our most gifted teachers abandon the schoolroom with regret on account of the niggardly compensation now provided for them. I stand for making school-teaching not a temporary job but a permanent profession for the men and women who love it and are worthy of its honors. On the one hand we can not afford to sacrifice from the teaching force of the country any worthy and capable member of that profession; on the other hand, they can not afford to remain in the work unless their minds are free from the fear of old-age poverty. They do not ask for affluence, but they have the right to calm assurance of peaceful comfort in their declining years.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, nearly every State in the Union, at least nearly all the States in the North, pay their school-teachers a pension. My own State pays $16 per month on the basis of 25 years' service. All of the teachers in the State contribute to the fund from which the pension is paid. But aside from the contributions which the teachers make, the State itself, on the basis of 25 years' service, pays $16 a month.

This bill proposes that the teachers shall contribute not to exceed 8 per cent of their salary on the basis of $1,500. It proposes that the Government shall pay on the basis of $10 a month for 40 years' service and less for a less number of years' service. The annuity which the teacher buys by the assessment levied against the teachers' pay will amount to $600 a year on the basis of 40 years' service, and the maximum compensation that can be drawn under this bill for 40 years' service is $1,000. So that commits the Government to the payment of not to exceed $400 to any teacher who has given 40 years of her life to the service of the public.

Every fireman, every policeman, everywhere—that is, anywhere in the United States—receives a pension. And it is only a short time since this House increased the pensions of the firemen and the policemen and increased their pay more by far than any compensation that can ever be received under the law that is now before us for consideration.

The most arduous work in all the world is performed by the teachers of the public schools of America, and they are the most inadequately paid of any profession. They must give four years of their life, after they have grown to manhood and womanhood, to acquire the knowledge that fits them for the work. They must continue to acquire this knowledge from the day they enter the profession until the day they die. It is one continuous effort. They are the instrumentality through whom we lay the foundations for the future of American citizenship. Shall we say that those who mold the minds and the hearts and the souls, if you please, of the children of America shall be left to die in poverty in their old age after they have given all there is in them to the people of America? I think a more patriotic service is performed by the men and women in the public schools than by men on the front lines of battle in a war. Their work is just as strenuous. It is a work that requires an education and a lifetime of experience. It requires a high moral standard. They are the examples which our children follow as they move along through life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. And we who are here to speak for the people of America can not afford to say that we will not encourage the best minds and the best morals to enter upon the work of teaching our children.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am asking this for information. The gentleman stated that the policemen and the firemen in the District of Columbia were on the status of civil pensions. How long have those laws existed?

Mr. MADDEN. For a long time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And the basis proposed here for so-called pension of school-teachers would give the school-teachers less remuneration and annuity than is now paid under existing law to the policemen and firemen?

Mr. MADDEN. By all manner of means. And this is not the only place in America where policemen and firemen are pensioned. They are pensioned in every city of the North. I do not know what you do in the South in that regard. They are pensioned everywhere, and they ought to be. They offer their lives for the protection of property and the lives of our people in every community.

And these men and women who are engaged in this laudable work are offering their souls in order that the children of America may grow up in patriotic fervor, filled with the knowledge of the fundamentals of American liberty, filled with the spirit of Americanism, filled with that love of our institutions that may be handed down untarnished to the generations who are to people this continent in the ages to come.

Shall we say to those who are engaged upon this kind of work that we are not interested? Shall we say that we do not care what kind of knowledge, what kind of morals, shall be inculcated in the minds and hearts of our children? Shall we say to these patriotic men and women who devote themselves to their calling unselfishly, without hope of reward, without any expectation of remuneration to protect them as they grow old, that we are not willing that they should be given an insurance policy which will make them feel at ease as they pass along through life performing this wonderful work for America? We want them to feel at ease.

They can not accumulate a fortune out of the compensation which they receive. They can not even save any money out of it. They are willing to be assessed as much as 8 per cent of their meager salaries, on the basis of $1,500 per annum, and out of this 8 per cent turned into the Treasury of the United States, as it is to be, invested by the Secretary of the Treasury, an annuity is to be purchased in their behalf, so that as they grow old in the service and are no longer able to perform the functions for which they have been employed and to which they have given their lives they will be able to say, "At least we shall not be compelled to go to the poorhouse; we are permitted to be treated as human beings, to live among those we love, in the homes of those with whom we have associated during our active period of existence, and as we wither away in the declining years of our lives this will enable us to feel that we shall be surrounded by the children of our friends, and that we may be permitted to listen to the prattle of the rising generation as we sit awaiting the call to the other side." [Applause.]

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida moves to strike out the last paragraph.

[Mr. SEARS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, while the bill that is now before the committee may not give the teachers as large an annuity as it ought to give, it is in the right direction; it is along the right line.

There are some 36 States in the Union now where teachers are pensioned. There is no occupation in the world to-day that needs and deserves rightfully a pension so much as that of school-teaching. There is more need, there is more justice, in giving the school-teachers a pension than giving a pension to any other people that perform public functions. The policeman after he has arrived at a certain age may still do some of the work he is accustomed to perform, but that does not affect anyone else. Those in the various departments of the Government after having arrived at a certain age, where they are no longer able to perform efficient work for the Government, if you do not retire them upon a pension, no harm is done, except an expenditure of money, if you will allow them to rest in an easy rocking chair the rest of their lives, as long as they remain in the Government service. Of course, they ought to be pensioned properly. They ought not to remain there after they have become superannuated. They ought to be retired on a pension. But no injury is done to anyone. It is entirely different, however, in the case of the school-teacher. The school-teacher's status is entirely different. There is no occupation in life to-day where the man or woman must maintain, from the beginning to the end of the work, a supercharacter such as that which the school-teacher should and must maintain.

The public demand it. The State demands it, as it is entitled to; and when a teacher by reason of age has lost that virility and vitality which are necessary, your child and mine should not be compelled to be under the supervision and tuition of that teacher. Not only does he do an injustice to the public and to himself, but he does an injustice to the rising American citizen. The public has an interest in every child that goes to school. The public has a right to have the very best brains and mentality of the teacher given for the benefit of the school. Everyone knows that the school-teacher is an example in the community. The boys and girls both look up to the school-teachers as examples for their guidance. When those teachers become inefficient because of old age, after 25, 30, or 40 years of their best service given to the children and to their country, to make better citizens—and that is what we are all striving for—those teachers should not be turned out and sent to the poorhouse. [Applause.] The object of this Government is that we may live happily ourselves and that those who come after us may have an equal opportunity or better than ours.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, generally speaking I am not in favor of the pension system for civil employees. If this were purely a pension to be paid out of the Treasury without any contribution on the part of the teachers who will be benefited, I would hesitate a long while before I would vote for it, notwithstanding the fact that I realize the poor position that the teacher occupies. But I do not believe this legislation can be placed wholly upon our interest in the teacher. I think we ought fundamentally to place it upon the interest of the Nation. If we secure a higher grade of teaching by any reasonable means, we are justified in doing what we can to secure it. I doubt not that every Member of this House will agree with me that what is done in the formative years of childhood largely determines what the Nation will be in its manhood and womanhood. Therefore during the period of character making, which is the most important and critical time in a person's life, it is of the utmost importance that those who have to do with the making of character should be of the best attainable sort. The teacher has most to do with that; far more so than the minister, and probably more so than those in the home; for the teacher has the pupil nine months in the year, five days in the week, and six hours in the day at the time when, under the circumstances of influence and discipline, there is more formation of character than at any other time in the life of the individual. I hold that the greatest asset of America is its childhood, and the test of what that childhood is to be when it reaches manhood is determined in the years when the child is under the influence of the teacher. One of the most essential factors in the formation of a proper civilization is the teacher of the youth of the Nation. Therefore we ought to see how best we can get, not any teacher that can be found, not the person about whom it is said that if he fails in everything else he can teach school, but we ought to make it possible to secure the very finest manhood and womanhood in America, to go into the schools to preside over the children, and take care of them in the formative period in the making of the character of those young men and young women.

Everybody in this Chamber knows that under the present system it is absolutely impossible to secure for the schoolroom the type of men and women that we need, except and alone where we find those so consecrated and dedicated to a life work for the good they can do that they are willing to sacrifice all ambition, all opportunity for a career, to go into the schoolroom and be nothing more than a mere school-teacher in order to do a great piece of work for the future of the Nation. That class, I admit, are a great portion of the teaching profession. But we ought not to make it necessary for that to be so. I distinctly recall an incident when Horace Mann, having been nominated for the governorship of the State of Massachusetts, was on the same day elected president of a college in Ohio, and had to make up his mind whether he would continue in a political career, fraught with great possibility of achievement—because at that time he was a Member of this House, being the successor of John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts—whether he would take the governorship of his State or resume the work of a schoolman, which he had interrupted when he came to this House in 1848. It will be recalled that he had been this country's greatest educational statesman. He replied to the offer, stating that if certain conditions were met in order that he might inaugurate some needed reforms in higher education he would be glad to let go of public life and resume work for the young people of the country. They met the conditions which he imposed and he went on to be inaugurated as president of the new college; and when he dedicated the four buildings that had been erected he made the startling statement in the presence of the governor of Massachusetts, who had gone to Ohio for the dedication and who sat on the platform during the ceremony, that if the expenditure of this money for the building of this institution would save one single boy or one single girl to the service of the country, the buildings would be more than paid for. When the governor of Massachusetts jocularly interrupted, "Why, the president is enthusiastic," Mr. Mann overheard it, and turning to the governor, said, "Do you not agree with me?" The governor replied, "Well, had my training been otherwise and had I been trained for a schoolmaster, I probably would agree with you." Mann said, "Well, were the boy to be saved my boy I would not exchange him for the money that goes into these buildings."

That was the estimate he placed on the life of a young man. That is the estimate that should properly be placed upon the life of a young woman. And when we realize how much the Nation depends upon the character of teaching in the public schools of America, then the measly amount that is being paid for that service throughout the land will seem to us a disgrace to the Nation; because prior to the war the average annual salary of a school-teacher was $523, and the average salary in 1916 was only $630. While I do not have the figures, now it is probably not over $630. That is the average throughout the United States. And no man or woman can enter a first-class high school as a teacher without first having had four years' training in a high school and then four years' training in a standard college. This high standard of preparation is demanded in the interest of the Nation. Then think of a man or woman of such training being offered $630. Why, nobody but an idiot would be willing to sacrifice a career and attempt to do the work necessary to qualify for such service from the usual motive which stimulates mankind—proper recognition by compensation—no one save him who is consecrated to a great service. Only the altruistic motive to help the Government would induce anyone to make the sacrifice involved in taking up a life work of school-teaching. This should not be so. The teacher, for the sake of the national welfare, if for no other, should have a definite, substantial appreciation determined by the act of the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Can the gentleman tell me what the salaries are that are paid to teachers in the District of Columbia?

Mr. FESS. The superintendent gets $6,000 and the principals $2,100. Is not that so, I will ask the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. MAPES. I am not sure what the principals get, but the basic salary this year was $750——

Mr. FESS. I thought it was $800.

Mr. MAPES. The present appropriation bill has increased it to $850.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will pardon me, Mr. Thurston stated before the committee that the average salary is a little over $1,100.

Mr. CANNON. That is for those who enter and those who get the higher salaries. Does that include the $240 increase?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It does, according to this statement.

Mr. FESS. Eleven hundred dollars is a very good salary as salaries for teachers range throughout the country. It is better than is found throughout the land, but is very poor in comparison with other remunerations.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman understands that the $850 is without the bonus.

Mr. FESS. I want to compliment the committee on its aid to the teachers in this city.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks that his time be extended for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. I think the schools of the District are being placed on a basis that ought to operate very largely as a model system for the whole country, and for that, as an additional reason, I am extremely anxious that whatever legislation on this particular issue is written shall be model legislation, that it may be copied, if necessary, by other sections and perhaps by the States.

I said in the opening that I am not favorable to the idea of pensions inherently. It is more or less offensive to me. I would do as some suggested—pay better salaries to avoid the needs of a pension—but, my friends, you will not do it, and there is no use to talk about it, and that argument can not be practically urged against this measure for that very reason.

When you arrange for a fund to retire upon, which is largely supported by the teachers themselves, as in this proposed measure, it cuts out the objections that might be had toward the pension system, and for that reason I think this bill is written on the right plan and will become a model throughout the country for public-school teachers' retirement.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Why would it not be a good plan to place this matter on a business basis—have no vacation, but let the school run right through the year and not have the teachers work only nine months?

Mr. FESS. That is the most objectionable feature, that the teacher is compelled to have three months' enforced vacation, not to say idleness, for she has to pay what she has been able to save in the year to go to a summer school. This we demand of her, so that her mind may remain not only alert but capable on all modern methods.

Mr. PLATT. The vacations cause the scholar to lose three or four years of schooling.

Mr. FESS. And yet there are some people who object to having the pupil in school nine months, and say that it is too hard on them. I sincerely hope this measure will not only pass in this Congress but that those who have voted steadily to amend it and those who are now arguing against it on principle, as they put it, will on final vote join us as the measure of their appreciation of the vastly important service of determining the character of the coming generations by the type of training and the brand of influence exerted upon the youth of to-day, who become the responsible citizens of to-morrow.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, there has been no amendment offered to this section, and I would like to see if we can not agree on the time for closing debate. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be limited to 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that all debate on the section and amendments thereto be limited to 25 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. GREEN of Iowa having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 87. Joint resolution authorizing the President to distribute food supplies to drought-stricken territory.

RETIREMENT OF SCHOOL-TEACHERS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, when I came to the Sixty-fourth Congress, if there was anything paramount in my mind that I felt I wanted to do something about it was the question of retirement. I had studied the question a long time, particularly as applied to post-office employees. I have seen this Congress, since I have been a Member of it, adopt a plan of retirement pensions for firemen and policemen. We find on the statute books a plan of retirement for the soldier and the sailor and the marine, and it seems to me that the justice of this bill, the economy of it, the skill with which it has been drawn, considering the claims of these noble men and women, certainly gives them a position where this step should be taken in their favor.

I am heartily in favor of this bill. Of course, in two minutes' time I can not discuss the question of retirement for public or private employees, or pensions for old people, but I can say there is so much good, so much justice, so much science in this bill that I do not see how this Congress can fail to adopt it.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I hope this bill will pass, and I wish to give briefly a few of the reasons which bring me to that conclusion. Twenty years ago I was opposed to any form of retirement pensions for persons in the public service, but a man is blind indeed who does not realize the trend of public sentiment, and it is righteous, I think, toward the retirement of some classes of employees. Like every other proposition, however, it must be applied wisely, justly, and with discrimination. Of all the propositions which have been made for retirement of employees, none is more meritorious than is the plan of retirement of public-school teachers. In arguing for this, one need not speak in favor of the teachers themselves, but in favor of the institution of the schools and of the children of the country. The teachers are the last to be considered among the merits of this proposition. Of all vocations, there is nothing into which the idea of profit or money enters in less degree than into that of teaching. He or she who begins teaching as a life vocation bars the door to fortune and can only look as recompense in life to a duty well performed and sacrifices made in the interest of the children and of the future generations.

Let us look at some of the evils connected with the public-school system. The public schools are a function of the State, plus the close personal supervision of the communities in which they exist. The success of the public schools depends upon the qualifications of the teachers and the supervision which those teachers receive.

The success of the school is governed by the equipment of the schools. One of the difficulties in our schools is in finding teachers not only who are trained by education but who by a consecration of spirit and love of their work are willing to give the best that is in them to the training of the children committed to their care. The evil in our school system lies in the fact that so many young men and young women seek it as a temporary bridge over which to pass to some other vocation which shall be more lucrative and which offers larger inducements. They of necessity can not give to their work the best that is in them. This retirement fund will remove from them the specter of poverty which confronts them in old age or when disability occurs.

Members should consider this bill without regard to their past prejudice, but in the light of the importance of this great institution of the State, the public school—as great in the District of Columbia as in any community of the country—and the problem ought to be greater, because this District should set an example to the public schools everywhere, not only of efficiency but of justice and fair treatment to the teachers, and set up a standard which should attract attention from all sections of the country. By providing this retirement fund we draw to the schools those who intend making teaching their vocation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, there is no Member of the House who will go further in granting a proper remuneration to the teachers of our land than I. In the Sixty-fifth Congress, when teachers were then receiving about $150 less than they get under present legislation, I offered an amendment to the bill then pending, in which I endeavored to provide the payment of a minimum wage of $1,400 a year to the teachers of the District. I would vote for such a measure now. I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] when he says that we should pick the best of the manhood and womanhood of our country to place as teachers in our schools. But do we propose to do that? We propose by this measure to pick those men and women by paying them a basic wage of $850 a year, and then provide for a pension of $750 after they have taught 40 years in the schools. Are you going to get the best in the manhood of the country and in the womanhood of the country through such a measure as that?

I want to say now that I am against civil pensions. If there is any one thing on earth that encourages thrift and economy it is a fear of old age. If there is anything on earth that encourages an extravagance and a want of thrift it is for a man or woman to understand that when they reach a certain age they will be taken care of by some means other than their own efforts. It is the fear of old age that makes every man and woman lay by each year a certain portion of their earnings, and I do not believe that it will be a good thing to offer a pension to any civil employee of this Government. I am in favor of a pension, as stated by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], only to the soldiers who have fought for the flag of their country.

We speak here of the teacher as being handicapped and circumscribed within the schoolroom. The whole blue sky is in front of every teacher in the land. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] himself came to Congress as a renowned pedagogue from the schoolroom. We have in the White House to-day a man who was almost as important and valuable when president of Princeton University as he is as the President of the United States, and as such he is the greatest man living to-day. They are not circumscribed. The whole blue sky is their limit. They have their ambitions the same as other people. No teacher is in the schoolroom to stay there the remainder of his life unless it suits him. Each one of them has in his breast an ambition some day at some future time probably to lead a different life, to be promoted, if you please, to some other branch. Are you going to get the best men and women by offering them a small pension?

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. PELL. I think the whole object of this bill is to make people stay in and not get an ambition to get out.

Mr. BLANTON. If you want to make them stay in, you must do like the New Yorkers usually do when they want a man for the job. You must pay what the man is worth. You must not offer them a basic salary of $850 and then a little measly pension of $720.

Mr. PELL. The gentleman is quite right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] introduced his amendment for $1,400 minimum wage for the school-teachers, which they ought to get, I voted for it, but that would not prevent me from voting for a pension for teachers if his amendment was adopted. If the gentleman knew anything about a metropolitan school system, he would not talk the way he does. In the first place, you must not forget that it takes years of preparation and study for a teacher to qualify herself or himself to enter a school system such as there is in the city of Washington, and after they have entered the school system they start out at a very low wage and have to put in years of service before the salary is raised to an amount that is worth talking about. The salary is but a small part of it; a teacher has to live under certain trying conditions. She has got to live in a suitable neighborhood, and she has to clothe herself in a respectable way, and it takes money to do it. She can not move around like other people. She must live in a section of the city that is eminently respectable, and she is under a certain expense in doing that. She has to take care of 40 or 50 or 60 children for six hours a day for nine months in the year. The other three months she is under greater expense. During her teaching period the hours she stays in the schoolroom are not all of her hours of service.

She has to study nights; she has to study for promotion; she has to study for the different grades if she is to progress, and in doing that it takes hours and hours of her time outside of the schoolroom; and to learn lessons that have to be taught to the classes she has to review the work the night before. Now, I am not going to talk about the necessity of maintaining discipline or the other duties they have to perform in instructing the children. But everybody who has been to school knows that it is a difficult thing to handle a room full of children. If you do not believe it, ask your wife or ask your mother and she will tell you that it is a difficult thing to take care of one or two children. The teacher is under a nervous strain all of the time, and after serving 30 years how many of them are going to get a pension under this law? How many of them do you think will be retired after 40 years of service? Why, the number that will be retired will not be worth talking about. Teachers who stay in the service 40 years should be retired. To keep a teacher in a school after she has broken down and becomes a nervous wreck is doing an injustice to the scholar as well as the teacher. Keeping instructors after 40 years of service is wrong, and the proper thing would be to retire them with a decent pension. Mr. Chairman I am in favor of the bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I presume most of us, at least those of us who have served for any considerable time in the House here, recognize the fact that it is unfortunate in a great many regards that the House of Representatives is compelled to sit as a town council for the city of Washington and the District of Columbia. We are so very busy with other matters I am sorry to say we are often neglectful of the Nation's capital. This has been, I think, especially true with regard to the salaries of teachers, and also even with regard to the public-school system of the District. I am very glad, indeed, that this year we have made quite a material increase in the payment of the teachers of the District of Columbia. They are not yet receiving the pay that they should receive, but I hope to see advances made until at least the teachers of the District of Columbia will receive adequate salaries commensurate with the services that they render.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Just for a question. I have only five minutes.

Mr. HERSEY. If we have not the bill for $1,400, the basic salary bill of the gentleman from Texas, before us and have before us this small pension matter, is that any reason why we should not support this bill for a small pension?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, no, I would say to my friend; no, indeed. The proposition that we have before us to-day has been so well demonstrated as almost necessary that I believe no gentleman on the floor of this House should hesitate in supporting it. Certain gentlemen said that they are not in favor of a pension system for civil employees. Whether they are or not this proposition at least has been demonstrated not only as useful but as much more than that. Every State that has adopted this system is earnest in its support. No State that has ever adopted this system has ever abandoned it.

The universal trend is in the direction we have before us in the provisions of this bill. There can be no question about that, so that if gentlemen are in favor of a proposition that has been demonstrated as beneficial whether it has been used, not only as beneficial to the teachers, not only as an encouragement for the profession, but as an actual improvement on the public-school system of the United States, they ought to support this bill. I realize that there are in the minds of many the belief that if we adopt this system in regard to school-teachers that it will be extended to civil employees of the District. I do not share in that belief. I do not think because we do one thing that we will do another unless it demonstrates that that other thing shall be for the benefit of the people. We have gone one step in hundreds of instances and in hundreds of propositions and have never taken the other step. Gentlemen who take that view of it that because the Government does one thing that has hitherto been done by private or individual enterprise that therefore we must do all things, have not, I am inclined to believe, an accurate understanding of the country's mind. I agree that in many directions the Government has gone too far——

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. But the taking one step does not by any means mean that we shall take all the other steps in the same direction.

Mr. BEE. Has the gentleman time to yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Just for a question.

Mr. BEE. Has the gentleman time for a question?

Mr. TOWNER. Just for a question.

Mr. BEE. I want to ask if it would not be possible in this legislation to double the per cent deducted from the teacher to save deducting the $10 from the Government's funds to obtain the same results? I am in favor of the bill. It occurred to me that that might make it much better.

Mr. TOWNER. Perhaps the gentleman's proposition might be a good one; but this bill is before us, has been carefully considered by the committee, and in my judgment should be supported.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I believe that in order to maintain the present standard of teachers in the District of Columbia this bill should pass. The District Committee considered this bill very carefully and thoroughly and had quite extensive hearings. It came out in those hearings that in one county over in Pennsylvania they had no one on the eligible list, and it was necessary to employ 70 or 80 additional teachers for public schools. They had to select them perhaps from a class of people who were not well educated and, as a consequence, they did not have competent teachers in some branches. That condition is true in a great many counties throughout the country. Young men and women educated and trained for the teaching profession do not care to enter public schools as teachers owing to the fact that they do not receive sufficiently large salaries. As a result, teachers in service for a number of years find that in old age or disability they have not accumulated sufficient money on which they may live. More attractive inducements in the line of larger salaries must be offered to secure teachers of high quality. I think it is not only important that a bill of this kind should be passed here but I believe it is only a question of time when such legislation will be enacted in all the States of our Union.

There are a number of teachers who have taught for years on small salaries, and I venture to say that if they were to be retired to-morrow they would find it difficult to earn a livelihood. And it does seem to me that a bill of this kind and character is essential for the institutions that we are so vitally interested in and the welfare of our children. I earnestly hope there will be no opposition to the bill, but that it will pass, as it passed through the committee, unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That any teacher who shall have reached the age of 62 may be retired by the board of education on its own motion or shall be retired if application is made by the teachers, any teacher who shall have reached the age of 70 shall be retired unless, in the judgment of the board of education, such teacher should be longer retained for the good of the service.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Section 3, page 3, line 13, after the word "teacher," strike out the comma and the word "any" and insert a period and the word "any" with a capital "A."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 3, line 14, after the word "judgment," insert the words "of three-fourths."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I am instructed by the committee to offer a substitute for that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers a substitute for the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. MAPES to the committee amendment: Page 3, line 14, after the word "judgment," strike out "of three-fourths" and insert in lieu thereof "of two-thirds."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, the reason for that amendment is this: There are nine members of the board of education, and three-fourths would make an uneven number. Therefore the committee proposes this amendment to make it two-thirds.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as amended by the substitute.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I invite attention to a provision of this bill expressed in section 3 by the word "may," in the sentence "any teachers who shall have reached the age of 62 may be retired by the board of education." In a subsequent portion of the section it says "any teacher who shall have reached the age of 70 shall be retired unless in the judgment of two-thirds of the board" he may be continued.

These provisions emphasize rather indirectly an important principle which should be taken into account not only in this bill but in the one proposed for the retirement of clerks in the executive branches of the service. I have but little sympathy with the oft-repeated idea of a dead line at a given age. My objection to that idea grows out of the fact that we are not dealing primarily with the question of age. The question is, What is the individual doing? What is he or she able to do at any particular age? You will find many teachers at 62 years of age better qualified to do good work than some teachers at 25, 30, or 40 years of age. Many of the teachers at 62 and even 70 years of age will be able to lead the minds of children more rapidly along the pathway of knowledge than a large number of younger years. So I think it is eminently wise that the committee has given to the board of education a discretionary power which makes that board practically a retirement board, so far as age may be concerned.

Now, lest I overlook another point, although it may be slightly aside from the provisions of the section, I want to invite attention to an urgent need, as I see it, in our public schools. I am not an ardent advocate of the pension idea, but will support this bill because of insufficient salaries in former years. But, my friends, what is the appeal to the school-teachers of America to-day? It is the duty of teaching in larger measure and with far greater efficiency American history and American civics in relation to the Government of the United States of America. [Applause.] Every element of Bolshevism manifested on the part of any man or woman in the public schools of this country should be sufficient ground for the immediate retirement of that person. [Applause.] These educational leaders are working at the foundation of our Government. They are laying the foundation for the future. A moment ago, in commenting upon this point, one of the Members very pertinently said, "Ah, Bolshevism manifests itself not so much in the public schools as it does in the colleges and the universities of the country." To that I said, "Amen." Why, my friends, let the educational forces be told clearly and distinctly that this kind of Americanism is to-day at the masthead, and that the intellectual forces of the country must equip themselves for it.

Over 30,000,000 boys and girls of school age are to be educated in relation to the leading facts and principles of American history and civics. That work can not be successfully performed unless the teachers in the public schools of the country are thoroughly informed and trained with respect to those facts and principles. Their minds and hearts must furnish an educational influence that will lead millions of American boys and girls into a thorough appreciation of their country, its achievements, character, and mission. The inspiring influences of American ideals must imbue the characters of teachers and pupils alike. They must learn to love the American Republic as it stands in vivid contrast with the monarchies of the Old World. To them a republican form of Government must be the diamond that shines with irresistible attraction in comparison with monarchy and autocracy wherever they appear. They must be able to distinguish readily and accurately between genuine patriotism and false pretensions as to love of country. They can accomplish these purposes more successfully as they come into close association with the leading characters in American history. Would they learn the lesson of loyalty to a great cause, to a struggling people seeking to throw off the restraints of monarchy that they might come into the enjoyment of free government? If so, let the teachers in the public schools of the country catch the spirit, wisdom, and purpose of George Washington, whose loyalty to the cause of American liberty shines with increasing brightness with the passing years. Think of Washington in contrast with Benedict Arnold! Note the wide difference between the two. Is it not evident that Washington could have had his own price in gold and almost any station under the British Government that he might have named? He could have secured those things by turning aside from the cause of the colonists and supporting the cause of the mother country. His loyalty, however, to the great cause of American freedom and personal liberty held him with unwavering devotion to the principles of free government. This characteristic of his life, supplemented by his wisdom and statesmanship, made him "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

Think of the splendid results that can be accomplished by the teachers in the public schools of our land if their hearts should throb with patriotic devotion as his did and their loyalty should be as firm as his was to the great cause of civil liberty. Thus they would become a fountain of inspiring influence in the lives of the boys and girls of America. New visions of civic life would be revealed; grander opportunities would appear; anarchy, Bolshevism, and their influences, threatening the life of the American Republic, would be banished. Under such conditions we would have an intelligent citizenship casting ballots from time to time for the principles that would perpetuate, elevate, and ennoble the American Republic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That any teacher who shall have reached the age of 45, and who by reason of accident or illness not due to vicious habits has become physically or mentally disabled and incapable of satisfactorily performing the duties of teacher, may be retired by the Board of Education under the provisions hereinafter stated.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MAPES: Page 3, line 18, after the word "forty-five" insert "or who shall have taught continuously for 15 years in the public schools of the District of Columbia."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment as a committee amendment. The committee thought that the bill as drafted was too severe on those who might teach in the schools of the District for a number of years, and who, through some physical disability, or through illness or accident, not due to vicious habits, should become incapacitated from further teaching. The bill as drafted originally provided for the retirement of those who were thus disabled at the age of 45 years, but the committee thought there should be added to that a provision that would give the benefits of this section to those who had been in the service of the schools 15 years, regardless of their age.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. I think the amendment offered is a good one, but what I wanted to ask was, What is the latitude of the phrase "vicious habits." You have not defined that anywhere, have you?

Mr. MAPES. No; that is not in the bill. I imagine it is defined by court decisions, however.

I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, with what has been said in praise of the school-teachers of the District of Columbia and of the teachers throughout the United States I agree entirely. Certainly no more important workers exist anywhere in the Republic than that great body of loyal, faithful instructors of the youth of the land. Also I agree that it is a service grossly underpaid throughout the United States generally. As to the pay in the District of Columbia, I confess I am not prepared to state, because I am not cognizant of just what increases have recently been granted.

But that, Mr. Chairman, is not the proposition here involved. I do not believe that the time has come in the economy of the affairs of this Republic when civil-pension lists should be established. [Applause.] I believe that the establishment of such a list bodies ill for the future of our country, and therefore, while I stand ready to vote a just and ample rate of compensation to the teachers, believing, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] said earlier in the day, that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and that we should at all times give to this great and loyal body of people full and ample compensation for the service they perform, I am not prepared to go to the extent of engrafting upon our system of government, even here in the District of Columbia, this policy of a civil-pension list.

I do not propose to discuss the practical workings of the system from the economic standpoint. The fundamental principle is involved here as much as it will be in any bill that is presented, and I think we may as well now and here meet that broad issue. [Applause.] Therefore I have offered this motion to strike out the enacting clause. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, those Members of the House, like the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and some other gentlemen who have spoken this afternoon, who expressed their great admiration and high regard for the teachers in our schools, and who admit that they are grossly underpaid and still oppose the provisions of this bill, seem to have a queer way of expressing their gratitude to the teachers of our children in the District of Columbia.

In the State of the gentleman from Tennessee there is a teachers' retirement law which pays, after the teacher retires, two-thirds of the salary of the last year that the teacher is in the service—much more than this bill requires the Government to appropriate for the teachers. Some people who criticize the bill for want of anything else to say criticize the deduction to be made from the teacher's salary and say that that is unfair and that if we are going to do anything we ought to appropriate the whole amount. That is an objection that the teachers themselves do not raise. As I said in my opening remarks upon the bill, the National Association of Educators have had a committee for the last few years studying teachers' retirement legislation. The Carnegie Foundation has had a committee studying the subject, and those committees have come to admit that those systems which require the whole appropriation to be made by the State have fallen down and are not workable, and the teachers no longer ask that. They say that, in order to succeed, the teachers themselves have got to contribute to the fund, but they should be given credit for their contributions, and when they separate from the service they should be allowed to take out what they have contributed, together with the accumulated interest.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WHEELER] spoke of some testimony before the committee about conditions in Pennsylvania. Instead of there being 80 teachers unqualified in the county to which he referred, the secretary of the National Association of Educators said that in that county there were 300 teachers that were teaching under provisional certificates. They were given provisional certificates because there was such a demand for teachers in the county and the schools had to be supplied in some way, but he said that these 300 teachers were not qualified to secure the proper certificates or to pass the required examination, and that even with those 300 people teaching with provisional certificates there were 20 schools in the county that were not supplied with any teachers at all. And the secretary of the association said very frankly that the standard of school-teaching in the country at large was deteriorating and going backward because of lack of salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan be given two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Michigan be permitted to proceed two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. It was brought out here this afternoon that the average salary paid to the District school-teacher was $1,140; not the minimum, but the average, including the principals, the superintendent, the supervisors, and so on. Everybody knows that the minimum salaries paid to Government clerks is more than that. As was brought out before the committee, 10,000 school-teachers came into the District in the last two years for the purpose of accepting positions in the Government service outside of the schools, and some of the teachers in the schools in the District have given up their positions in the schools for the purpose of going into other Government work.

Is there any reason to expect that the schools can compete with that sort of thing and maintain the high standard of our teaching force? Do you gentlemen want your children to go to schools taught by people who are not able to enter the Government service here and get an ordinary clerkship that pays $1,200 or $1,440 with the bonus? I think we owe it to American citizenship—not alone to the teachers but to the coming generations—to see to it that the teachers in our schools are provided for in some way so that during their school work they will not have hanging over them the fear of going to the poor-house after their retirement.

Mr. Chairman, under the rule, is not debate on this motion limited to five minutes on a side?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is the rule.

Mr. GARRETT. This is a motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DYER. To ask recognition for five minutes on this motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RUBEY. On which side does the gentleman desire to speak?

Mr. DYER. I desire to speak in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate close at the end of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Michigan that the debate is already closed. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I am much surprised at the motion made by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, one of the most learned Members of this great body, a man who is highly educated, and who ought to be in favor of giving to every boy and girl in this country the same opportunity to obtain a good education that he himself has had.

There is no more deserving set of people in the whole land than the public-school teachers of America. The boys and girls of our country, the men and women of to-morrow, who will have the responsibilities in the years to come, depend for their fitness to discharge those duties upon the opportunities given them to obtain an education. It is impossible for the youth of America to be educated without they have teachers. We ought not to expect men and women of good qualifications and good character to go into the public-school rooms of this country and work year after year without the opportunity to lay aside a penny, until they reach the age of 70, or until they become incapacitated before that, without some provision for their future. In my home city I know of women who have taught for half a century in the public schools who have not been able to put aside any money because of the meager salaries paid them. Yet those salaries in my city are better than those paid in the District of Columbia. I say we ought to make some provision for these people who give their time and their lives to the training of the youth of our country. The men and women who are teaching the children of this country are doing as great a service as anyone can do. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that in this bill we have started toward the accomplishment of something that ought to have been done years ago. This matter has been pending here for many years. I remember how eager and anxious many members of the Committee on the District of Columbia were to bring this legislation to fruition more than eight years ago when I was a member of that committee. It is a most worthy piece of legislation, and every man who has given it the consideration to which it is entitled and who has no prejudice in his heart, who comes with open mind and with an adequate knowledge of the situation, must, in my judgment, favor this measure.

A few months ago the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and myself and others visited the island of Porto Rico. We found there thousands upon thousands of children who had never been inside of a schoolroom, who could not read or write a word, children growing up in total ignorance, because there were no teachers to instruct them. They could not obtain sufficient teachers from the United States to go to Porto Rico to teach the children. They had some there, but on account of the low pay and on account of the scarcity of teachers in the United States, they could not obtain the teachers, so the children are growing up in ignorance.

Gentlemen, I hope this motion will not prevail.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to extend my remarks by submitting the following memorandum in regard to a bill (H. R. 3164) that I have introduced to regulate the business of pawnbrokers in the District of Columbia. It is as follows:

The bill as drawn contains all the essential provisions of the present law of Michigan on the subject, and may fairly be said to be a paraphrase of that law for adaptation to the District. Many of the provisions will be found in the former law of Congress of March 2, 1889 (25 Stat. L., 1006), superseded by the later act, now in force, of February 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L., 657).

The enactment of the law of 1913 was, as is well known, the result of an agitation extending over quite a period of time respecting the alleged impositions of the "loan sharks," so called, which impositions, it is not to be denied, called for proper legislative attention. The bill, as originally drawn, did not apply to pawnbrokers, and when, in the form in which it was passed by Congress, it was before President Taft for consideration it was earnestly and justly represented to him that its provisions far overshot the original mark, and that, if enacted, the effect would be to put an end to the business of pawnbrokers in the District of Columbia, no matter how legitimately or fairly undertaken to be conducted. In a public hearing given by President Taft upon the subject, a stenographic report of which was made at the time and the main features thereof published in the daily papers in the first few days of February, 1913, the President expressed his own fear that the law would prove too drastic and would accomplish a result wholly without the contemplation of its framers—namely, the practical denial to those of small or limited resources, and without the means of furnishing collateral, of the possibility of borrowing the small sums required for their needs from time to time.

And exactly this result followed. When the act of 1913 was still pending in Congress it was shown by an examination of the books of the five leading pawnbrokers in the District that during a period of 12 consecutive months the average amount of the loans of one was $2.25; of the second, $5.44, 75 per cent of which were for sums of from 10 cents to $5; of the third, $11, 57.8 per cent of which were for sums from 25 cents to $5; of the fourth, $3.90, 80 per cent of which were for sums from 10 cents to $5; and of the fifth, $9.50, 75 per cent of which were for sums from 25 cents to $5. According to this showing, the average amount of the loans made by all five was $6.42, and the average per cent of loans of $5 or under was 73.2 per cent.

There were also at the same time pressed upon the attention of Congress the obligations under which the pawnbrokers were then required to carry on their business, namely: First, to give bond to protect borrowers; second, to keep full and accurate accounts of all their transactions; third, to make daily reports of all transactions to the police; fourth, safely to store and keep for at least one year the pledges deposited as security for the loans; and fifth, to be at the expense of having public auction sales of all unredeemed pledges, on which sales the auctioneer alone received a commission of 8 per cent for his services.

Obviously, also, the expenses of bookkeeping, clerk hire, storage, and so forth, necessarily borne by the pawnbrokers consumed a very substantial proportion of the interest charged, and it was demonstrated—as indeed is obvious—that the expense to the pawnbrokers in these respects was as great in the case of the smallest as of the largest loans made.

Accordingly, when the rate of interest allowed to be charged by the pawnbrokers was reduced from 3 per cent to 1 per cent a month, it was found impossible for any pawnbroker to continue his business in the District of Columbia, except at an annual loss; and as a consequence the business of pawnbroking in the District was completely ended, and there is not now in the District, or possible to be, a pawnbroker engaged in the business. The result of this, as respects those depending upon pawnbrokers to obtain loans of any amount, has been, and is, wholly to deprive that class of borrowers of any and all opportunity to borrow, no matter how great or how urgent their needs.

In addition to the expenses above mentioned, there would now have to be borne by any pawnbroker going into business the expenses of additional taxation on account of the intangible tax, so called, which has been imposed since the passage of the act of 1913, and also the surtaxes and excess-profits taxes already provided by law, and the new taxation seemingly imminent, besides the greatly increased cost of conducting business due to the conditions caused by and growing out of the pending war; and this alone, independently of everything else, demonstrates the utter hopelessness of anyone undertaking to carry on the business under the provisions of existing law.

And that the result and effect of the act of 1913 are as stated, namely, to put an end to the business of pawnbroking in the District, is also convincingly and conclusively shown by the fact that ever since the law became effectively operative there has been a practically continuous effort made to procure the enactment of a more reasonable law, in which effort some of those prominently engaged are among the very ones most instrumental in bringing about the passage of the law.

No one of the bills now before Congress will afford the remedy which all are agreed to be necessary if the business of pawnbroking is to be permitted at all in the District of Columbia; and, besides this, no one of those bills provides the borrowers anything like the adequate protection which would be afforded them by the bill proposed. The most casual comparison of the pending bills and the one proposed makes this too plain for argument. And the existing law is likewise glaringly defective in this respect, for, whereas the bill proposed is most adequate and explicit as to the obligations of a pawnbroker to protect the borrower—as by the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and sixteenth sections thereof—the existing law is practically, if not wholly, silent in respect thereof.

As respects the rate of interest contemplated by the bill, a comparison of the charges allowed by the existing law of other jurisdictions is both instructive and interesting. Annexed hereto is a statement compiled from information obtained from various officials of the States mentioned and the Russell Sage Foundation, which latter, as is well known, was conceived in the idea of superseding the business of pawnbrokers and providing a substitute therefor, the experiment of which has thus far fallen greatly short of the anticipation of those making it, if indeed it may not be said to be an already demonstrated failure. Especial attention is invited to those jurisdictions the laws of which provide a sliding scale of rates of interest, depending upon the amount and length of the loan (New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, and Virginia); of those which allow a fixed charge, no matter how small the loan (Michigan and Oregon); and of still others which allow an extra charge for storage (Vermont, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Georgia); while in still other States the business is governed by license fees and regulations without any limits as to the rate of interest to be charged (West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Florida, Wyoming, and Idaho).

And one of the bills now pending before Congress, namely, H. R. 4534, known as the Cary bill, by section 7 thereof, allows interest at the rate of 3 per cent per month on loans up to $50, and 2 per cent per month on loans over $50, or fraction thereof. This last-mentioned bill has received the approval of at least 26 organizations in the District, including the Central Labor Union, the Central Union Mission, the chamber of commerce, and many of the well-known citizens' associations, all testifying the desirability and indeed the urgent necessity of a restoration in the District of the pawnbroking business upon and under living terms.

Although doubtless superfluous, it may be added that experience more and more demonstrates the absolute necessity to every community of the class of pawnbrokers, and the great hardship of denying to those under the necessity of patronizing them the opportunity so to do; and everyone of average, or even ordinary, information knows that in various foreign countries the State takes upon itself the business of pawnbroking and permits none others so to do, in the conviction of an unavoidable necessity for the business and the purpose to see that it is conducted upon terms of fairness and accommodation to the patrons thereof.

And it is not an exaggeration to say that legislative records and enactments will be searched in vain for the discovery of any better law on the subject than that which obtained in the District prior to the enactment of the existing law; and the records, administrative and judicial, of the District will show that the pawnbrokers always satisfactorily and scrupulously lived up to that law, with the result not only of supplying a needed accommodation to those classes of the community requiring it but also of offering the greatest assistance to the officers of the law engaged in the prevention of theft and the recovery of stolen articles. In this particular alone the contrast between former conditions and those now existing, under which the failure to recover stolen articles has increased 40 per cent, is of itself a potent, and indeed sufficient, reason for the enactment of the proposed bill.

The annual report of the police department in 1910 shows amount of property stolen, lost, or misplaced, $137,462.23; amount recovered, $104,479.50; amount not recovered, $32,982.73; or recovery of about 77 per cent of all stolen goods.

For the years 1916 and 1917 the recovery will not exceed 14 per cent of property lost, stolen, or misplaced.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Reserving the right to object, is the gentleman in favor of the motion?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am in favor of the motion.

Mr. GARRETT. I think that would be fair.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I must confess that when this bill was first presented for consideration to the committee I was in very grave doubt as to the correct position to take upon it, because policemen and firemen in the District of Columbia have been given a pensionable status. Like a great many other gentlemen who have spoken here I am heartily in favor of preserving the best interests of the school-teachers in this country. I know that the salaries paid to them in the States are shamefully inadequate. I have the honor to serve on the Committee on Education in this House, and I have introduced one or two measures which I thought would go far toward preserving the interests of the school-teachers and the removal of illiteracy in the United States.

But when you come to analyze the provisions of this specific bill it seems to me beyond controversy that it is a species of class legislation to which I am opposed on principle. Now, why is that a legitimate inference? This bill applies only to the school-teachers in the District of Columbia. There are about 2,000 of these school-teachers. The testimony before the Committee on the District of Columbia shows that the average pay of these school-teachers is something over $1,100 per annum for nine months' work.

I am of the opinion that the school-teachers in the District of Columbia are within the provisions of the bill we passed a few days ago for a minimum wage for all Government employees, which would give them a minimum salary of $1,300 per annum. The average pay of public-school teachers in Alabama will not average $500 a year.

If we are proposing to establish a civil pension list it seems to me that we ought to bring in a bill affecting all civil employees of the Government of the United States, if, indeed, not all the teachers in the different States. If the school-teachers of this District are entitled to the benefits of this law, why, on principle, should not the rural carriers in the United States be entitled to it? If the school-teachers in the District of Columbia who on the present salary or rate of compensation are receiving much larger salaries than the school-teachers of different States, why should not all the employees of the Government of the United States be put upon the same basis? And when you look at it from that standpoint I do not see how we can escape the conclusion that it is special personal legislation of a class and character for the benefit of the school-teachers not of the United States but of the District of Columbia. If this retirement pension authorized to be paid District of Columbia teachers were to be paid by money provided from taxes solely collected in the District, I would support this bill; but I am opposed to taxing the teachers of my State to confer a special benefit on teachers here.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BEE. Does not the gentleman differentiate between employees under the civil service for life and school-teachers who are elected year by year? There is a difference between the two systems.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I can not see any difference from the standpoint of remuneration, and that is the proposition here. We are placing it on the proposition that they are entitled to something in their old age. A great many of these teachers get $1,800 and $2,000 a year for nine months' work. Surely they can save something out of such salaries by economy and thrift to be their own bankers after 40 years of service. The farmer gets no pension; the coal miner gets none, nor the wage earner, the artisan, the doctor, the preacher. I can not consistently support the provisions of this class legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. I object.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT) there were—ayes 26, noes 63.

So the motion was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the spelling of the word "incapable," on line 20, page 3, will be corrected by the Clerk.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That following the passage of this act every teacher who shall be retired under the provisions of section 3 or section 4 hereof shall receive during the remainder of his life an annuity composed of (1) a sum equal to 1 per cent of his average basic salary received since the passage of public act No. 254, approved June 20, 1906, for each year of his whole term of service, and (2) an additional sum of $10 for each year of said service, such annuity to be payable monthly and to cease and determine at his death.

The following committee amendment was agreed to:

Page 3, line 24, strike out the words "to whom this act applies."

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That in case of the death of a teacher while in the service, the amount of his deductions, together with the interest then credited thereon, as provided in section 2 hereof, shall be paid to his legal representatives.

In case of the death of an annuitant before he shall have received annuity payments equal to the amount of his deductions, together with the interest credited thereon, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to his legal representatives the balance remaining to his credit at the date of his death.

The following committee amendment was agreed to:

Page 6, line 9, strike out the words "the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to his legal representatives the balance remaining to his credit at the date of his death," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "as hereinbefore provided, the balance thereof remaining to his credit at the date of his death shall be paid to his legal representative."

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the discharge of any teacher at any time in the discretion of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia under the provisions of existing laws.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 14, page 7, strike out the words "existing laws" and insert the word "law."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the term "teacher," and all forms thereof, under this act shall include all teachers permanently employed by the board of education in the public day schools of the District of Columbia, including the superintendent of public schools, the assistant superintendents, all supervisors and directors of instruction, group principals, principals, special teachers, and librarians therein; the term "basic salary" shall be construed to mean the lowest salary of the class in which the teacher is placed; and whenever the pronoun "his" occurs in this act it shall be construed to mean both male and female teachers.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 7, line 15, after the word "teacher," strike out the words "and all forms thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in lines 18 and 19, the following words: "the superintendent of public schools."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 18, strike out the words "the superintendent of public schools."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, as I said in my opening remarks, it seems to me that it would be nothing short of an outrage to take from the Public Treasury money that has been taken from the people and pay a pension of $1,000 a year to a man who to-day is being paid $6,000 a year. When a man is getting $6,000 and then wants to hook himself up with people who are receiving comparatively small salaries, in order to get that through, it seems to me that he ought not only to lose the pension and the salary, but he ought to lose his place. [Applause.] I do not believe that the proposition can be defended, and believing that and stating the abstract proposition to the House, I leave it with the House.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, of course this bill is primarily for the average teacher, and in the first instance what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] says appeals to one. My information is, however, that no State law excludes the superintendent of schools, and under the provisions of this bill a superintendent is limited to an annuity based upon a salary of $1,500 per year, even though he should come under its provisions in other ways, which is very difficult for him to do. If he is allowed to remain in the bill he has the opportunity of buying an annuity of 1 per cent on an average salary of $1,500. He would not be allowed to pay an annuity on a salary of more than that amount. The average superintendent in the schools of the District of Columbia is here less than 10 years. If a man grows up in the service in the District, becomes a teacher, then a principal, then a superintendent, why should he not be allowed to come under the provisions of this law? Why should he not be allowed to buy an annuity the same as any other teacher that is in the District? It seems to me the superintendent ought not to be stricken out of the bill, but should be allowed to stay in and receive the benefits if perchance he serves long enough to come within its provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky) there were—ayes 45, noes 47.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky and Mr. MAPES to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 59.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That in order to carry out the provisions of this act during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the sum of $50,000, including not more than $5,000 for clerical and other services and all other expenses and rent in the District of Columbia, is hereby appropriated, one half out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia. Thereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall include in his annual estimate of appropriations a sum sufficient to continue this act in full force and effect. No officer or employee receiving a regular salary or compensation from the Government shall receive any additional salary or compensation for any service rendered in connection with the system of retiring teachers provided for by this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 8, lines 24 and 25, strike out the words "in the District of Columbia."

Page 8, line 25, and page 9, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "one half out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia," and insert in lieu thereof the words "from the revenues of the District of Columbia and the Treasury of the United States in the proportion authorized by law."

Page 9, lines 6 and 7, strike out the words "to continue this act in full force and effect" and insert in lieu thereof the words "to carry out the provisions of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to perform, or cause to be performed, any or all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect; and his decision as to the amount to be deducted, the amount of interest to be credited, and the amount of an annuity or refund to be paid in any case shall be final and conclusive, and shall not be subject to review by any officer or authority.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

In line 17, after the word "effect," strike out the balance of the section.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend and revise my remarks on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. REAVIS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 5818, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. It was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia with instructions to forthwith report the bill back to the House with an amendment to strike from the bill, on page 7, in lines 18 and 19, the following words: "the superintendent of public schools."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky) there were—ayes 47, noes 71.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

SOLDIERS' SETTLEMENT BILL.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Kentucky withhold that for just a moment to allow me to make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Then I expect to move to adjourn. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to address the House for 30 minutes to-morrow morning, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, on the soldiers' settlement bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming——

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to speak on the same subject for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made——

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, just a moment. Reserving the right to object, as I understand both the gentleman from Wyoming and the gentleman from Mississippi are on the same side of the question of the soldiers' land bill I would suggest that if we are entering into a general debate on the proposition the other side should have some time.

Mr. MONDELL. I withdraw my request if the gentleman is going to insist on asking for further time.

The SPEAKER. Will not the gentleman from Kentucky withhold his point of order until the Chair can lay before the House a message from the President?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Wyoming has withdrawn his request.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask it anyhow. [Laughter.] When is this bill going to come up in regular order?

Mr. MONDELL. Very soon, I hope.

Mr. CANNON. I hope that it will never come up. [Laughter and applause.]

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 8117. An act for the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Falls, Wyoming County, Pa.; and

H. R. 8076. An act authorizing the county of Montgomery, Tenn., to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River within 7 miles of Clarksville, Tenn.

PASSPORT CONTROL (S. DOC. NO. 79).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, suggesting that the passport control act of May 22, 1918, be extended for one year after peace shall have been concluded between the United States and the Central Powers of Europe, and that ample appropriation be made for an efficient execution of that act and the regulations made under it during the remainder of the fiscal year.

This recommendation brings up for your consideration a very important question of policy which has an intimate relation to the welfare of the country. Information from the agents of the Government in foreign countries indicates that as soon as the existing restrictions upon travel are removed many persons will seek admission to this country, and that among the number are not only persons undesirable from the point of view of becoming future citizens, but persons whose origin and affiliations make it inadvisable that they should be permitted to enter the United States. The act of May 22, 1918, which makes possible the prevention of undesirable individuals from departing for the United States will automatically cease to be operative upon the establishment of a condition of peace. Individuals will then be free to come here for whatever purpose they choose and many will come for purposes which we can not approve and which may indeed be dangerous to the country and to its institutions.

The immigration officials enforcing the immigration laws at the ports of the United States will not be able successfully to prevent the entry of all improper and dangerous persons because of the impracticability of developing a system of intelligence and investigation abroad to work in sufficiently close relationship to the immigration organization in the United States to be thoroughly effective in distinguishing between those individuals whose right to admission should not be questioned and those whose admission would be injurious to the country. The experience gained during the war shows that an efficient system of passport control administered by the Department of State through the diplomatic and consular officers in foreign countries can be depended upon to exclude practically all persons whose admission to the United States would be dangerous or contrary to the public interest. If the Congress concur in the view that the national welfare requires that the class of persons to which I have alluded should not enter this country, it is my belief that the simplest and most effective method that can be adopted would be to continue the system of control now being carried on by the Department of State, working in close cooperation with the Commissioner General of Immigration.

It is obvious that effectiveness of control can only be obtained through supplementing the regular diplomatic and consular personnel with a sufficient number of reliable and capable men, and such men as would be useful can be had only through the payment of adequate compensation. The Secretary of State estimates the expenditure required for the remainder of the current fiscal year at $750,000, including a number of additional employees in the Department of State who would be charged to supplement the administrative organization now maintained there. I quite agree with the view that it is entirely useless to make any outlay upon this work unless sufficient money is provided with which to make control effective. It would be most unwise to permit the public to rest under the impression that an effective control was being exerted over persons seeking admission to this country when in fact, owing to inadequate personnel and an inefficient administration of the law, dangerous persons were freely crossing our boundaries.

It is important that I should add that the increase in the number of persons desiring to come to the United States has already almost overwhelmed the existing organization abroad, and that it is very doubtful whether the system of control can be kept in operation for more than a few weeks longer without additional appropriation.

With the relaxation of restrictions upon transportation which are gradually taking place, the burden of examining applicants for passport visas will become so great as to be entirely beyond the capacity of the number of officers whose employment existing appropriations make possible. Therefore, it is of the utmost importance that if the Congress should decide, as I hope it may, that the public interest requires that the existing system of control should be maintained and extended, it will enact the necessary legislation preferably by joint resolution and make ample appropriation at the earliest possible moment.

WOODROW WILSON.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] makes the point there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAPES. As the House will adjourn before the vote is taken on the motion to recommit and on the final passage of the bill, the previous question having been ordered on both motions, will those votes comes up in the morning as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. Certainly. They will come the first thing in the morning as unfinished business. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] makes the point of no quorum.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 26, 1919.

(Legislative day of Saturday, August 23, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there has been a good deal of criticism recently in the public press of the work we have been doing in connection with injured soldiers. A part of it has been due to provision in legislation which already we have amended, and it may be that some additional legislation will be necessary to facilitate handling of the subject. I hold in my hand a discussion of conditions by the director of the Federal Board for Vocational Education. I do not wish to discuss the subject at this time, but later on in the week I may do so, and I may possibly find it necessary to suggest additional legislation. Meanwhile I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a discussion of conditions by Dr. Prosser, director of vocational training.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION,
Washington, August 22, 1919.

To Members of the Congress:

There has been called to the attention of the Federal Board for Vocational Education by several Members of Congress a communication addressed to all the Members of that body by Robert Browning, signing himself as field representative of a new organization known as the Association of Disabled Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines. Inasmuch as this communication was apparently made without knowledge of the actual conditions, the board invited Mr. Browning to come to its office at Washington, in order that these errors might be pointed out to him and the actual facts placed in his hands. Since he has failed to do this and has allowed his publicly made statements to stand without correction, the board finds it necessary to send to the Members of Congress the following answers to his statements, the latter being given in quotation marks, followed by the statement of the board.

I.

"Many of those being trained under the board auspices have objected to their pay being reduced by the board by the amount that they earned while learning a new trade. This is manifestly unfair, they claim, since such a method offers no incentive for progress, and it encourages the employer to exploit the disabled soldier."

* * * * * * *

No deductions have been made or will be made by the board in the training pay of disabled men because of moneys earned incidental to their work while students in training in shops, offices, farms, or anywhere else.

II.

"Another grievance of the association is that it has not learned of a single disabled soldier among the one thousand nine hundred odd employees of the Federal board."

* * * * * * *

The records show that at the present time there are 256 ex-service men in the employ of the board, of whom 48 received disabilities in the service. Preference is being given to discharged soldiers, and among discharged soldiers to those who, in spite of their disability, will be able to qualify under the civil-service rules and do the work. Most of the employees of the board are female stenographers and typists. Where disabled men are qualified for this work, they have been given employment. Disabled men in training in commercial courses are being assisted by the district offices to qualify under the civil service as soon as they are able, so that vacancies in the force of the board may be recruited from their ranks. It must be remembered that while the civil service has, under the President's order, established a separate list of ex-service men, these men must meet the civil-service requirements as to qualifications in order to be eligible to employment—a process that requires time.

III.

"A number of men have complained that in spite of President Wilson's order that physical examination be waived in the cases of men certified by the Federal board for civil-service jobs, the board refused to give the men the required data, and that consequently they were unable to obtain the positions under the civil service."

* * * * * * *

The board receives applications of disabled men who desire to train for civil-service positions. Up to the present time 61 men have applied through the board for training for civil-service positions. The following table shows the action taken by the Civil Service Commission on these cases since May 17, 1919:

Approved	27
Approved if the test for physical disability which the board is having made is satisfactory	14
Rejected for one position but approved for another	4
Returned for further medical data	5
Rejected because disability made work impossible	11

Even if it appears to the representative of the Civil Service Commission on the first review of the case when it is presented to them by the board that a man can not qualify for the position desired, the door of opportunity is not closed to the man. If his physical condition improves or if a satisfactory test is made later the man's case can again be placed before the civil service for a decision.

The above table shows that only 11 applications for civil-service positions have been rejected by the commission. Some of these cases were those of men suffering from active tuberculosis, who will not be put in training by the board under any conditions. In other cases the man desired an occupation which was entirely unsuited to the nature of his disability. These cases were rejected by the commission and very excellent recommendations made as to opportunities in other Government positions.

IV.

"The Federal board has failed to be guided in the administration of its work by the sound scientific principles evolved by other countries that have been recognized as the pioneers in vocational reeducation."

* * * * * * *

The statement that the Federal board has not been guided in the administration of its work by the scientific principles evolved by other countries is without foundation. The former vocational secretary of the Canadan Military Hospital Commission has been assigned to the board as special advisor since the very beginning of the work. The former district vocational officer of the Province of Alberta organized most of the district offices and has been field organizer in the United States since the very beginning of the work. Representatives of the Federal board visited France and made a thorough study of the French rehabilitation system. A study of the systems used in the various countries will show that Canada and the United States are far ahead in the administration of the problem. The only difference between the United States and Canada is in the fact that the United States Government is very much more liberal in awarding subsistence and training to disabled men. A great many men now in training in this country would not be considered eligible for training in Canada. It is also true that no other country has the provisions available for practically all disabled men that are made available by section 3 of the vocational rehabilitation act, under which, as has already been stated, every man awarded compensation under the war-risk insurance act may pursue a course of instruction for which the Government will pay the entire cost, without subsistence, while in training.

V.

"According to a report of the Federal board under date of June 21, 1919, only 11 men have been placed in remunerative employment after completing courses of training. This would indicate an alarmingly low figure, considering the number of disabled soldiers who have completed courses."

* * * * * * *

Of the 119 men reported by District officers as completing training 12 will not resume employment now because they are ill or resting; 35 will resume training in the fall; 6 have left training, giving no address; and the status of 12 cases has not been reported. This leaves a balance of 54 men, of whom 42 have been placed, or have placed themselves; 12 men only are pending placement, and their cases are being pushed vigorously. It is difficult to secure the immediate placement of normal men, including even those discharged from the service without disabilities. The problem becomes doubly difficult when the man has a handicap and often requires testing and time. Inasmuch as the status of men in and out of employment and in training changes rapidly, the number given above—12—will vary, but in general it expresses the situation. The statement that only 11 men completing courses have secured employment, and that therefore 108 men have finished their work and have been neglected by the board, is obviously untrue.

VI.

"Hundreds of men have complained that they were compelled to wait from six weeks to six months without pay and forced to depend on the help of friends or charity before their cases were finally acted upon by the board."

* * * * * * *

It is not the function or duty of the board to provide support for men immediately on discharge from the service or to provide support for any disabled men, other than those who have been placed in training, because they are in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of their disability. Support of disabled men after discharge was provided for by the Congress in giving a $60 bonus, and by paying compensation through the War Risk Insurance Bureau for disabilities received. Furthermore, the original vocational rehabilitation act provided that the board could not make payments to men in training until compensation was awarded by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

At the time the President signed the amendment to section 2 of the vocational rehabilitation act there were 3,633 cases which had passed the district case boards and had been approved for training by the Washington office. In the discharge of its responsibility the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is required by law to secure legal proof of many things before it can award compensation, and unavoidable delays result. These 3,633 men had not been awarded compensation, and the board was therefore legally unable to approve or provide training. Since July 11 all of these cases have been acted upon, and the districts have been authorized to proceed with training in all cases in which the training was necessary within the meaning of the amended act.

VII.

"It has recently come to the attention of the association that the Federal board has issued to its 14 district officers an order that precedence be given to cases of seriously disabled men over those with minor injuries. Such a ruling is resented by the thousands of soldiers who have suffered less conspicuous disabilities, but who, nevertheless, are prevented from returning to their old jobs and who need retraining just as much as the men who have given an arm or a leg in battle."

* * * * * * *

Since it was impossible administratively to handle immediately the many thousands of applications before the board when it was given a free hand by the Congress on July 11, 1919, the board decided to concentrate its efforts in getting men with major occupational handicaps into training at once. We reaffirm the justice and wisdom of this policy. Your attention is invited to the fact that the board's definition of a major occupational handicap includes not only those suffering from loss of limb, which are comparatively few, but many thousands of cases that are suffering from disabilities less obvious than amputations which prevent their return to employment. Moreover, in order to be eligible for training at the present time it is only necessary for the man to show that he has a temporary major handicap. If he is suffering from a temporary major disability, which may be entirely cured in six months, such as the after effects of chlorine gas, leaving tachycardia and shortness of breath on exertion, he is considered eligible for training. The standards adopted by the Federal Board for Vocational Education are more lenient than those of any other country and a larger proportion of disabled men will be embraced within the provisions of the vocational rehabilitation act in this country than in any of the warring nations. An examination of the files of the Federal Board for Vocational Education will show hundreds of applications for training made by men who were discharged with a very slight or almost negligible disability. Several men, for example, who were discharged from the Navy on account of seasickness request training, because they are unable to return to their previous occupation of clerk. On account of the generosity of Congress in providing liberal allowances for disabled men in training a great many unworthy cases applied for training at the district offices. All of these applications were given due consideration, as it was thought that these men, although suffering from an apparently slight disability, might really be in need of training. It has been found that the men suffering from negligible disability are as insistent on immediate action as those suffering from major disabilities. While the pressure from disabled men was increasing many experienced men left the staff of the board to return to their former positions, and the work has in consequence been greatly handicapped. It was therefore administratively impossible to give serious consideration to all cases with minor disabilities. As an administrative program it was decided to attend first to the serious cases, get these men in training immediately, and to adjudicate the claims of the slightly disabled men after the more important problems had been met, remembering that they may be assumed to be in receipt of or soon to receive as support such compensation as they are entitled to from the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

VIII.

"The Federal board has acted in a bureaucratic fashion by demanding for its headquarters in Washington absolute power, and by depriving its district vocational officers of any initiative."

* * * * * * *

The statement that the Federal board has not given the districts sufficient authority, is without foundation. The districts have been given whatever authority is possible. As the board is operating on a budget system it is impossible to assign the expenditure of funds to the district offices. If the district offices were allowed to place men in training prior to central offices' approval thereby contracting large obligations, the board would soon contract to spend money far in excess of its appropriations. In order to control the expenditure of Federal funds, it is absolutely necessary that control be exercised by the central office and the board thus discharge the duty imposed by Congress.

IX.

The Federal Board for Vocational Education "has shown a decided unwillingness to cooperate with existing agencies that have offered their facilities freely and generously for training and absorbing into employment disabled soldiers."

* * * * * * *

The board is using at the present time 546 existing State and local institutions for training disabled men and is training disabled men on the job in 198 factories, workshops and offices throughout the country. The board has to its knowledge refused to use offered facilities in not more than six cases and these were refused for good and sufficient reasons.

The board has excellent cooperative arrangements with the Departments of Commerce, Labor, and Agriculture, the War and Navy Departments, the Public Health Service, the Surgeon General's office, War Department, the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, Navy Department, the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the United States Employment Service, the American Red Cross, the Council of National Defense, the National Catholic War Council, the National Manufacturers' Association, the American Federation of Labor, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the Elks' War Relief Commission, the Elks' Clubs throughout the country, the Rotary Clubs throughout the country, and with casualty insurance companies throughout the country, as well as many hundreds of others.

The board is cooperating with more than 30,000 public and private agencies, National, State, and local in their scope and in countless ways is securing invaluable aid from them in the discharge of its task.

X.

"The Federal board has announced that it has made contracts with 146,931 for training, and that of this number only 5,808 already have been placed in training. At its present rate of progress it will take the board more than a year to place this number in training. As a result over 100,000 disabled men will be waiting without pay from the Federal board."

The board has not made contracts with any soldiers. It has established contact with 133,367 soldiers. By contact is meant that the board has, through its representatives in person or by correspondence, gotten into touch with this number of soldiers. Of this number 110,135 have actually been interviewed and surveyed by agents of the board in the desire to reach every man in need of training to overcome the handicap of his disability.

Of these men a great majority are not eligible to training under the law because they are not in the language of the law "in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of their disability." They are able to return to their former occupations successfully where, in addition to their wage, many will receive compensation from the War Risk Insurance Bureau. The board expects to administer the law in the most liberal spirit possible, and to give the soldier the benefit of the doubt where any exists. Training under section 3 of the act is made available to every man awarded compensation by the War Risk Insurance Bureau. Every such man is given a course of instruction if he will take it, and the expense of tuition, books, supplies, and traveling is paid by the Government. In every case where a man because of a temporary or total disability is unable to enter employment successfully, the full support provided by the law for him and his dependents is paid in addition. Beyond this the board can not go under the law whatever may be its personal feelings.

If it is the intention of Congress to provide vocational rehabilitation to every man discharged with a disability rated as 10 per cent or over, Congress should realize the expenditure involved by a program of this magnitude.

The weekly statistical report of the General Staff of August 7, 1919, contains the following:

"The Army had reported to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to July 1 the names of 149,433 men discharged from the Army with disability. Only cases showing 10 per cent disability have been reported. At this rate it seems probable that the total number of cases of disability resulting from the war and entitled to compensation will be close to 200,000."

These figures are exclusive of disabilities incurred in the Navy or Marine Corps. Estimating this number at 50,000, makes a total of 250,000 men discharged with disability rated as 10 per cent or over. If these men receive training with support it will involve an expenditure of $350,000,000; only $16,000,000 have been appropriated. Moreover, the $350,000,000 required for support and tuition for such a group of men does not include their traveling expenses, medical care, or mechanical appliances nor the expenditures for equipment and for administration.

It is impossible to conceive that all men who have received disabilities in the service will need retraining in order to return to their old occupations. The experience of Canada, whose standards are more liberal than those of any of the European countries, shows that approximately 10 per cent of the disabled men need retraining. If this country doubles the percentage of men trained by Canada, there would only be 50,000 men to be retrained. The statement that over 100,000 disabled men will be waiting without pay from the Federal board is, therefore, obviously without foundation.

The theory and intent of the war-risk insurance act and the vocational-rehabilitation act was that compensation should be given to all disabled men to compensate for the disability as a handicap in employment, and that training should be given to those unable to return to employment successfully because the handicap of the disability interfered with their specific occupation. Inasmuch as it is not the function of the board to provide compensation as support for all disabled men, but only to provide maintenance for those needing training, the charge that 100,000 men will be waiting without pay from the Federal board has no foundation in law or in fact.

To this date a total of 14,876 cases have been approved for training, of which 7,356 have been placed in training, the rest having been notified of the approval of their courses and are awaiting the opening of the schools which they will attend in September. It is obviously impossible to send these men to school until the schools open. A total of about 17,000 men will be in training by October 1. In the seven months since demobilization of disabled men in large numbers began, and the board secured entrance to the military hospitals, the board has approved for training as many men as Canada has approved in four and a half years of war, and has in training at the present time as many men as Canada. From present indications the United States will by October 1 have passed the Canadian figures as to total number of men in training since the war began, in 1914.

By increasing the rate of support to men in training the Congress has by recent legislation made the maintenance of disabled men in training and their dependents average about $100 per month, thereby making an award of training financially advantageous. Many people look upon this training pay as a legal right of every man with a disability, however slight or negligible, comparable to the $60 bonus and the award of compensation. This is not the law, and consequently the board is unable to administer it from any such standpoint; but it is on the basis of this misconception that great pressure is being brought to bear from returned soldiers and persons occupying prominent public positions. To satisfy this demand that every man discharged from the service with a disability be placed on the Government pay roll at an average salary of $100 per month, it will be necessary for Congress to amend the present law and to face without hesitation an expenditure of from $400,000,000 to $500,000,000 before the task is completed.

This may be, and in the opinion of many persons is, the best and most equitable solution of the difficulty. They hold that as a measure of social reconstruction every man injured or diseased in the service should be given, at Government expense, a minimum of from 6 to 12 months of training, and believe not only that this training is due all such men as compensation for suffering, but also that money spent in this way on them will provide the largest social return.

The Federal board stands ready and will be glad to answer any inquiries or respond to any call Congress may make for a clear and comprehensive understanding of the administration of the rehabilitation law.

Respectfully, yours,

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION,
By C. A. PROSSER, Director.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GAY. I present resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Association of Commerce of New Orleans, La., requesting legislation relative to the reclamation of the vast areas of swamp and arid lands in the United States with a view to cooperating with the State governments and the local authorities in the reclamation of these lands and the bringing of these lands into cultivation and the opening up of them to settlement. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by board of directors of the New Orleans Association of Commerce, Friday, August 15, 1919.

Whereas the most important and far-reaching question before the public to-day is the reduction of the high cost of living; and

Whereas one of the most potent influences for the reduction of the cost of living would be the increase in the acreage of tillable and cultivable lands and the opening of such lands to settlement and cultivation by returning soldiers and others; and

Whereas in recognition of this situation the Congress of the United States has with the Mondell bill (H. R. 487) and the Smith-Chamberlain bill (H. R. 7634 and S. 2536) taken up actively the subject of the reclamation of the vast areas of swamp and arid lands in the United States with a view to cooperating with the State governments and the local authorities in the reclamation of such lands, the bringing of such lands into cultivation, and to throwing them open to settlement; and

Whereas in order that such legislation may be speedily enacted, it is highly desirable that Congress shall be made aware of the fact that public sentiment not only approves of but urges the immediate enactment of such legislation; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Association of Commerce of New Orleans be requested to take active steps to call to the attention of the Congress of the United States the hearty approval which the general principles contained in the legislation above referred to meets in this and other sections of the country and to the desirability and necessity of such legislation in the near future; be it further

Resolved, That the board of directors be, and they hereby are, requested to call the matter to the attention of the commercial organizations throughout the United States, in order that those organizations might cooperate and lend their influence to securing the passage at an early date of the legislation in question.

AMERICA'S PARTICIPATION IN THE WAR.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, the United States of America undertook, on April 6, 1917, the mightiest enterprise in the annals of time, to wage successful war 3,000 miles across the sea, with an Army that had not been raised, to be transported in ships that had not been built, against an enemy that must be fought in the air, on and in the earth, and under the sea, a powerful enemy, that had whipped the other great nations of the Old World to a standstill.

The war was lost to the Allies till America entered it, and our entry determined its outcome, changed defeat into victory.

The achievement of our Nation in this greatest World War was truly remarkable, and now that it has been brought to a victorious end it is well to review the difficulties met and larger things accomplished in the operations from the declaration of war, April 6, 1917, to the signing of the armistice, the conclusion of hostilities, November 11, 1918, in order that the extent and magnitude of our participation may be realized.

When the country entered the war it was not anticipated in America nor suggested by France or England that any great force was expected to be transported overseas, nothing even approximating the great Army that was actually sent. More than 4,000,000 men served in the United States Army during the war, the total number in service in the armed forces of the country, including the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and other services, reached the number of 4,800,000 men; about 5 of every 100 American citizens were in the service in defense of the country.

During the Civil War 2,400,000 men served in the Northern Armies and the Navy. About 10 in each 100 inhabitants of the Northern States saw service as soldiers or sailors.

It will be noted that in this war were raised twice as many men, in actual numbers, but in proportion to population only one-half as many, as served in the Union Army in the Civil War. No proper comparison, however interesting it might be, can be made between the American Armies during the present war and those of France and Great Britain, Italy, and Germany for the reason of diverse military policy of these nations. In France, for example, it was the policy to mobilize and put into uniform most of the able-bodied men of the nation not beyond military age and then assign the soldiers to work that had to be done whether it was directly of a military nature or not. Our policy was to take into the Army only those men physically fit to fight and to assign them to work directly related to the ordinary duties of the soldier, save in exceptional cases. The work of making munitions, operating railroads, and building ships was done by men not enrolled in the armed forces of the Nation.

The policies of the other governments were different from the two described, and for these reasons any accurate international comparison of armies will not be possible until the figures are available showing the numbers and lengths of service of the men in the combatant forces of the different nations rather than the figures on hand showing the total numbers on the rolls called into the service. One comparison can fairly be made, however, between the American Expeditionary Forces and the British. Both countries devoted their greatest effort to landing, increasing, and maintaining their armies in France.

The British sent to France more men in their first year than we did in our first year, but it took England three years to reach a strength of 2,000,000 men in France, while the United States accomplished the task in one-half of that time. The British, it was true, had to use men from the beginning to fill gaps in their ranks caused by casualties, while the American forces were for months increased in strength by all new arrivals.

THE ARMY AT HOME AND ABROAD.

The most difficult feature of the American undertaking is found in the concentration of our greatest effort into the few months of the spring and summer of 1918. It was not until then, when the German Army was smashing its way through the allied lines in March, 1918, that the Allies called upon America for the supreme effort that carried a million and a half soldiers to France in six months. When war was declared there were only 200,000 men in our Army. Two-thirds of these were Regulars and one-third National Guardsmen who had been called to Federal service for duty along the Mexican border. When this war ended this force had been increased to twenty times its original size and 4,000,000 men had seen service, 2,000,000 of these overseas. This Army was composed of 13 per cent Regulars, 10 per cent National Guard, and 77 per cent, first designated National Army, raised under the selective draft. More than half a million came in through the Regular Army and 400,000 through the National Guard, and more than three-quarters of all through the selective draft and National Army enlistment. Of every 100 men, 10 were Guardsmen, 13 Regulars, and 77 belonged to the National Army. The entire service was consolidated and the distinction wiped out on August 7, 1918, all the armies being designated as the Army of the United States.

THE SELECTIVE DRAFT.

The most remarkable feature in the history of our preparation for war was discovered in the willingness with which the American people consented to and accepted the selective draft for raising the Army. It was contrary to the history, traditions, and practice of our country which had only resorted to conscription aforetime under direst necessity, and such conscription had then only resulted in procuring an almost negligible quantity of soldiers, who were regarded as slackers and despised accordingly. Despite previous hostility to such a policy only a few disturbances arose during the application of the draft, which were suppressed without great difficulty and usually by the local authorities. No such odium attached to the drafted men in service in this army as formerly, doubtless because of the universality of operation and the reasonable uniformity and fairness of its administration, and the standing of the drafted soldier, a few months after the law was passed, was as honorable in the estimation of his comrades and the country as was that of the volunteer. Moreover, the record of desertions from the Army discloses that the total number was smaller than in previous wars and that a smaller per cent occurred among drafted men than among those who volunteered.

The draft law was passed in May, 1917, and under its operation with subsequent amendments all the man power of the Nation, from the ages of 18 to 45, inclusive, was mobilized; 24,234,021 men were registered under this law and slightly more than 2,800,000 were inducted into the military service thereunder, all of which was accomplished in a manner reasonably fair to the men, and the Army was thus supplied with soldiers as rapidly as they could be equipped and trained, and it resulted in a minimum of disturbance to the industrial and economic life of the Nation.

The first registration, June 5, 1917, covered the ages from 21 to 31. The second, one year later—June 5, 1918, and August 4, 1918—included those reaching 21 years of age after the first registration. The third registration—September 12, 1918—extended the age limits down to 18 and upward to 45 years. Under the first and second, 10,697,814 men registered, and 2,666,807, or 25 per cent, were inducted into the service. Under the third, 13,228,762 registered, and 120,157, or less than 1 per cent, were inducted.

Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico registered 325,445, of which 23,272 were inducted, or about 7 per cent.

About 12 per cent of the whole number registered were inducted into the service. The entire male population of the country was about 54,000,000, and during the war 26,000,000 of them, or nearly one-half, were either registered under the selective-draft law or were serving in the Army and Navy by enlistment. Forty eight per cent of the total male population was registered or in service, as against 52 per cent not registered.

The experience of the Civil War furnishes a basis for comparison of the methods used and the results obtained in the two great struggles, and the comparison is strikingly in favor of the modern method. Large sums were paid as bounties during the Civil War to induce men to enlist in the hope thereby that recourse to conscription might be made unnecessary, but the hope was finally defeated, and the draft was resorted to and carried out by methods expensive and inefficient.

The whole matter may be summed up by noting that during the war with Germany twice as many men were raised for the American Army as were raised during the Civil War and at one-twentieth of the cost—that is, twenty times as much more was spent by the Northern States in the Civil War in recruiting their armies than was spent for the same purpose by the United States in the war with Germany. In this war 60 per cent of all armed forces was secured by the draft, as compared with 2 per cent in the case of the Civil War.

In the fall of 1917 the first half million men came into the service rapidly. During the winter the accessions were few relatively, while in the spring of 1918, with the advance of the great German drive, and upon urgent calls from France for unlimited numbers of men, during a period of a few months the number of men brought into the service rose into the hundreds of thousands, reaching the highest point in July, when 400,000 were inducted. During the following months the numbers fell off considerably on account of the epidemic of influenza, and in November inductions ceased entirely, due to the unexpected ending of the war.

PHYSICAL FITNESS.

Under the operation of the draft registrants received two physical examinations; first by the local board, and only those found fit by that board were sent to camp for a second examination by Army surgeons, who rejected all those found unfit for service. From the data acquired and the records of these two examinations a comparison has been made which shows how the men from the different States rated in physical qualifications.

There has been published by the War Department a map showing the per cent of drafted men passing physical examination, by States.

It shows the States divided into four groups. The first class, sending from 70 to 80 per cent of the registrants examined, are: Arkansas, Kansas, Iowa, Kentucky, Oklahoma, Texas, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Wyoming, and New Mexico.

The second class, where 65 to 69 per cent passed examination, comprises Wisconsin, Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, West Virginia, North Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Maryland, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Montana.

States in the third group, where 60 to 64 per cent passed test, are: Oregon, Idaho, Nevada, Utah, Georgia, New Jersey, Tennessee, South Carolina, Virginia, and Pennsylvania.

The fourth group, where only 50 to 59 per cent passed the examination, are Arizona, Colorado, California, Washington, Michigan, New York, Vermont, Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Delaware.

It is noteworthy that the States which sent men of so high an order of physical excellence that from 70 to 80 per cent of them passed both examinations and were accepted into the service are only 12 in number and mostly located in the Middle West, a belt extending through the country North and South. Arkansas, my own native State, constitutes one of this first class. Next come the States, about equal in number with the first class, from which 65 to 69 per cent of the applicants were accepted, which are mostly contiguous to the first group of States on the East and West. Of the third group, only from 60 to 64 per cent of the men passed the test, while in the first group, indicated in solid black, about one-fourth of all, only 50 to 59 per cent of the men were accepted. These come from the Northeast and the far West and especially the portions of the West which have in recent years become popular as health resorts and attracted large numbers of physically defective people. It is significant also that the best records are made by those States that are agricultural rather than industrial, and where the number of recent immigrants is not large. Conversely, most of the States making low records are preeminently manufacturing States whose populations included large numbers of recently arrived immigrants. Further analysis of the records of physical examinations shows that the country boys made better ratings than those from the cities; the white registrants better than the colored; and the native born better than those of alien birth. The differences are so considerable that 100,000 country boys would furnish for military service 4,790 more soldiers than would an equal number of city boys. Similarly 100,000 whites would furnish 1,240 more soldiers than would an equal number of negroes. Finally 100,000 native born would yield 3,500 more soldiers than a like number of foreign born. The importance of these differences will be appreciated by noting that 3,500 men are equivalent to an infantry regiment at full war strength.

OFFICERS.

About 200,000 commissioned officers were required for the Army—1 for every 20 soldiers—and less than 9,000 were in the service at the beginning of the war, 5,791 with the Regulars and 3,199 were officers of the National Guard in Federal service.

The statistics show that one of every six officers had had previous military training in the ranks in the Regular Army or the National Guard, three received training for commissions in officers' training camps organized for the purpose, and two went from civilian life into the Army with little or no military training. Of the last group the majority were physicians, a few ministers, and the most of the others were men of special business or technical training who were taken into the supply services or staff corps.

SHARE OF EACH STATE.

The following diagram, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, shows the number of men, officers not included, furnished by each State, whether by enlistment in the Regular Army, coming in through the National Guard or being inducted in the draft. Arkansas, my own State, is twenty-fourth on the list of States and furnished for the Army 61,027 men.

Diagram—Soldiers furnished by each State.

TRAINING—SOLDIERS—DIVISIONS.

The average American soldier who went to France received six months' training at home before sailing, and had two months' training overseas before entering the battle line, and then about a month in a quiet sector before going into an active sector and hard fighting, although the experience of thousands of soldiers differs widely from this figure.

The infantry soldier was trained in the division which was our typical combat unit. In the American Army the division was composed of about a thousand officers and 27,000 men.

Training and sorting organizations of 10,000 men, known as depot brigades, were also utilized, but, as far as possible, the new recruits were put immediately into the divisions which were the organizations in which they would go into action.

There were trained and sent overseas 42 divisions before the signing of the armistice. The training of 12 more was well advanced and 4 others were being organized at the time. The plans on which the War Department was acting, called for 80 divisions overseas before July, 1919, and 100 divisions by the end of that year.

Of the 42 American divisions which reached France, 36 were organized in the summer and early autumn of 1917. The other 6 were organized as divisions by January, 1918, but had been in training as separate units months before that time. The average division had been organized eight months before sailing for France and its period of training was lengthened by a two months' interim between the time of landing in France and the time it entered the front line. While this is true of skeletons of divisions, it is not true of all the men they finally included, since sometimes weeks or months elapsed from the time a division was organized till it reached full strength and troops were frequently taken from one division to fill another which was sailing, or to be sent overseas to replace losses. Although the average of two months' training in France before getting into the fighting lines was maintained, the experience of divisions used as replacements in the last months was under this figure. The Regular Army divisions show the shortest periods of training, but they were made up of the most experienced soldiers.

The following table, which I ask to have included in the RECORD, shows the divisions organized and trained, the numbers by which they were designated, the camp where trained, and the States from which its members came at the time of organization. The general composition was afterwards greatly changed by bringing in replacements to make up for losses:

There are three groups of divisions—the Regular Army, numbered from 1 to 20, made up originally from Regular Army units plus volunteer enlistments and drafted men; the National Guard divisions, numbered from 26 to 42, came in largely from the militia of the several States; and the National Army divisions, numbered from 76 to 92, made up almost wholly of men called into the service by the draft. As a classification for easy recollection, it might be noted the Regular Army divisions were numbered below 25, the National Guard from 25 to 50, and the National Army divisions between 50 and 100. All the divisions shown in the table reached France except the 12 Regular Army divisions numbered from 9 to 20. The divisions being organized at the close of hostilities were numbered 95, 96, 97, and 100.

The average composition of the National Guard divisions was one made up of two-thirds State troops and one-third other troops. The Forty-second Division, called because of its composite character the "Rainbow Division," was made up of selected groups from over the entire country, and sent to France early. The Forty-first, called the "Sunset Division," was a composite of troops from many Western States. Four States furnished one division each, New York the Twenty-seventh, Pennsylvania the Twenty-eighth, Illinois the Thirty-third, and Ohio the Thirty-seventh.

CAMPS AND CANTONMENTS.

To carry out the training program quarters were constructed in a few months for 1,800,000 men; for the National Guard and National Army divisions 16 camps and 16 cantonments were built. National Guard units, organized rapidly in the summer of 1917, were put under canvas in camps throughout the South. The cantonments were largely located in the North for the National Army called in the fall of 1917.

The building of the cantonments was authorized in May, 1917, the last site was secured on July 6, and on September 4 accommodations were ready for 430,000 men. This capacity was shortly increased to 770,000, an average capacity for cantonment of 48,000. Camp construction went forward at the same rapid pace. Tents were provided for housing the soldiers, but a considerable number of wooden buildings were necessary, as well as water supplies, sewerage, electric lights, and roadway construction. The capacity of the camps reached 684,000, giving a total capacity, camp and cantonment, of nearly a million and a half. The Regular Army divisions were trained in part at one or another of these 32 centers, in part as separate units at various Army posts.

The Rainbow Division, National Guard, was assembled directly at Camp Mills for early transportation to France and required no training field. The Ninety-second and Ninety-third (colored), National Army, were trained in separate units at various camps; headquarters of the Ninety-second were at Camp Funston and the Ninety-third at Camp Stewart. The remaining 16 National Guard and National Army divisions began training in the camps and cantonments in the summer and fall of 1917.

There were schools for training men for special services, such as the Artillery, Aviation, Engineering Corps, Chemical Warfare, Tank Corps, and Quartermaster Corps, and also proving grounds and testing fields. There were also large embarkation camps at New York and Newport News, requiring housing construction with a capacity for more than 300,000 men.

INSTRUCTORS FOR TRAINING 4,000,000 MEN.

In the American Army there is 1 officer for every 20 men, which means that 200,000 officers were required for 4,000,000 men, and officers' training camps were established for supplying the 180,000 officers needed in addition to the 6,000 officers in the Regular Army and the National Guard officers already mentioned. Candidates for these camps were selected after rigid tests as to physical and mental qualifications, many Reserve Corps officers being included. Three months of intensive training put the prospective officers through all the tasks required of the enlisted man and the duties of the platoon and company commander. These training camps furnished the Army with nearly half its total number of officers and more than two-thirds of those for line service. After the close of the second series of schools in 1917 it was found desirable through various staff corps and departments to conduct separate specialized schools for training their officers, and many commissions were granted in these schools.

After the new camps were established France and England sent over to the United States some of their ablest officers who had seen service on the western front, to bring to our training approved methods developed in the war. Two hundred and eighty-six were furnished by France, their major specialties being artillery and staff work; 261 were furnished by England, and much of their effort was devoted to instructions in gas and physical training, and in addition to said number of officers the British also detailed 226 noncommissioned officers as instructors, who were assigned to different subjects in about the same ratio as the officers. These groups of foreign instructors attached to training schools, divisions, and other units rendered valuable service out of all proportion to their numbers. They were a significant contribution to our training program.

TRANSPORTATION, SHIPPING.

Lack of shipping furnished one of our greatest difficulties. The German submarine warfare had reduced the world tonnage so greatly that the enemy expected to crush the allied armies and win the war before the American Army could reach the battle field in force. There was also much skepticism in this country about our ability to land such forces in time to meet the condition. It will be remembered this lack of faith was voiced on the floor of the Senate by a member of the Military Affairs Committee, replying to the statement made by the Secretary of War, in December, that we could have 500,000 men in France by July 1, 1918. The Senator said:

> Yet the Secretary of War, who is compelled to depend on shipping to get his army and supplies across the ocean, is not in touch with the Shipping Board and shipping authorities and shipping information; that he makes a statement that is absolutely preposterous * * * and the result is that the Secretary of War is grossly misled into making an official statement to Congress, so exaggerated as to convey an entirely false impression as to what we can do and what we are doing. * * * All who are informed as to the present supply of our shipping were thunderstruck at the statements of Secretary Baker before the Military Affairs Committee. His sanguine predictions as to our ability to ship men to Europe, to supply them when there, are exaggerations of the wildest sort. * * *

Yet, notwithstanding all such disbelief and dire prediction of failure, the War Department sent over more than a million men by said date, July 1. The Secretary of War was not out of touch with shipping conditions. His statement was not a preposterous exaggeration of our ability. The War Department had not ceased to function, it had not fallen down, but on the contrary came forward with double the performance promised, that shattered the German hopes and mocked the fears of our own doubting Thomases.

More than 2,000,000 American soldiers were carried overseas after we entered the war—half a million in the first 13 months and a million and a half in the last 6 months. We began sending troops over upon the urgent request of our cobelligerents shortly after war was declared, but the movement was not rapid at first as we had only a few American and British troopships chartered directly from their owners. During the early winter, as the former German liners came into service, embarkations increased to nearly 50,000 monthly and had reached by the end of 1917 a total of 194,000.

Early in 1918 the British Government assigned three of its big liners and four of its smaller troopships to the service of the Army and an increased troop movement resulted in March. The great German spring drive took place in this month in Picardy, with a success that portended German victory. Every ship that could be secured was pressed into service. The aid furnished by the British was greatly increased. It was in May and the four following months that the transport miracle took place. The number of men carried in May was twice as great as the number in April and the June record was greater than that of May.

Before the 1st of July, 1918, 1,000,000 men had been embarked and the record for July exceeded all previous months, the number of troops carried being more than 306,000. Before the end of October the second million men had sailed from our shores. No such troop movement as that of the summer of 1918 had ever been contemplated and no movement of any such number of persons by water for such a distance and such a time had ever previously occurred. The record has been excelled only by the achievement in bringing our troops back to our own shores.

DEVELOPMENT OF TRANSPORT FLEET.

The trans-Atlantic fleet had to be created at the most acute stage of the world's shortage of tonnage, caused by submarine sinkings, and consisted on July 1 of seven troopships and six cargo ships, with a dead-weight capacity of 94,000 tons, and there was developed before the end of 1918 a great transport fleet, which aggregated three and one-quarter million dead-weight tons of shipping.

During the same months another great American transport fleet was created with almost equally striking rapidity—our cross-channel fleet, which carried cargo and men from England to France. Beginning with 7,000 dead-weight tons in October, 1917, it was increased to more than one-third of a million tons by the end of 1918. About one-fourth of these vessels were Swedish and Norwegian, while the rest were American. This service utilized large numbers of small wooden and steel vessels built by the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

In building up our trans-Atlantic and Channel fleets every possible source of tonnage had to be called on for every ship that could be secured. The first great increment was the seized German vessels, which came into the service in the fall of 1917. The taking over of the Dutch steamers in the spring of 1918 and the chartering of Scandinavian and Japanese tonnage accounted for great increases in the cargo fleet.

The most ample credit must also be given the Emergency Fleet Corporation, which turned over nearly a million tons of new ships, and to the Shipping Board Committee, which stripped bare our import and export trades of all suitable vessels and turned them over for Army use, nearly a million and a half tons of ships. The Army vessels also came from 12 other nations well scattered over the globe.

EMBARKATION AND DEBARKATION OF TROOPS.

Most of the troops left from New York and were landed in France and England in about equal numbers. Most of those landing in England went to Liverpool and those in France to Brest. The troops left for overseas from 10 American ports (4 in Canada)—in fact, counting Hoboken, Brooklyn, and New York as one and the Hampton Roads port and Norfolk one—and debarked, in fact, at about 14 foreign ports, 8 English and 6 French.

HELP FROM THE ALLIES.

Credit for the troop movement must be shared with the Allies, and with the British in particular, since approximately half of the troops were carried in their ships. Of every hundred men who went over, 49 went in British ships, 45 in American ships, 3 in those of Italy, 2 in French, and 1 in Russian shipping under English control. Part of the explanation for the large numbers of troops carried in American ships is to be found from the fact that under the pressure of the critical situation on the western front ways were found to increase the loading of our own transports by as much as 50 per cent. In addition our transports also exceeded those of the Allies in the speed of their turn around—the time required to take a load over, discharge it, return, load again, and start on another trip. In the spring of 1917 the average turn around for the troopship was 52 days and that for cargo ship 66 days.

During the spring, summer, and fall, 1918, the performances of both cargo and troop ships became standardized at about 70 days for cargo ships and 35 days for troopships.

The fastest ships have averaged under 30 days. During the spring and summer of 1918 the Leviathan, the former Vaterland, has averaged less than 27 days, as has the Mount Vernon, the former Kronprinzessen Cecelie. These turn arounds, made under the embarrassment of convoy, are much quicker than anything attained in commercial operation. During the summer the Leviathan has transported troops at the rate of over 400 a day, and so has landed the equivalent of a German division in France each month. Two American ships, the Great Northern and Northern Pacific, have averaged 25 and 26 days, respectively, and have each made turn arounds in 19 days.

CARGO MOVEMENT.

The first cargo shipment to maintain the forces abroad was 16,000 tons, made in June, 1917. The movement increased rapidly and steadily until in the last month of the war more than 800,000 tons were sent over. The cargo shipments were carried almost entirely in American ships, only about 5 per cent being transported in allied bottoms. The cargo carried for the American Army consisted of thousands of different articles of the most varied sort, and from the beginning of the war the Army shipped nearly seven and one-half million tons of cargo, about half of which were quartermaster supplies of food and clothing, the second largest amount being engineering and ordnance supplies. Included in the shipments were 1,791 consolidated locomotives of the 100-ton type, and 650 of these were shipped set up, a thing never done before, and we were prepared to ship set up when the war closed such locomotives at the rate of 200 per month. The Army also shipped 26,944 standard-gauge freight cars and was preparing to ship flat cars set up; 14,018 motor trucks went forward, and they were being shipped at the rate of 10,000 per month. Rails and fittings for railroad construction aggregated 423,000 tons. In addition to the tons of cargo above mentioned, the Army shipped 68,694 horses and mules and were shipping them at the rate of 20,000 monthly at the close of hostilities. Gen. Pershing also imported large amounts from European sources, the chief item being coal from England. He brought into France in our cross-Channel fleet 275,000 tons of coal and other commodities in October, 1918.

LOSSES AT SEA.

During the whole period of active hostilities the Army lost at sea only 200,000 dead-weight tons of transports. Of this total 142,000 tons were sunk by torpedoes. No American troop transport was lost on its eastward voyage. For this splendid record the Navy, which armed, manned, and convoyed the troop transports, deserves the highest commendation.

RETURN OF TROOPS.

Immediately upon the signing of the armistice preparations were begun for returning our troops in the shortest possible time. We were not able to use the British ships that were required to return their own colonial troops, so we devised methods for loading our transports and increased their capacity about 50 per cent, converted our cargo ships into troop transports, and with the German liners assigned to the service and assistance from the Navy, the Army is being brought home more rapidly than it was taken to France. More than 330,000 men were returned in the month of May this year, and if the sailors and marines be added the total is one-third of a million.

FOOD, CLOTHING, AND EQUIPMENT.

The problems of feeding and clothing the Army were difficult because of the immense quantities required rather than because of the difficulty in manufacturing the articles needed. The 4,000,000 men in the Army constituted about one twenty-fifth of the population of the country, and necessarily consumed their share of the food and clothing before the war, but the purchases for the Army are in surprising contrast with those of civilian use in normal times. For example, the Army purchases in 1918 of blankets were two and one-fourth times as great as the entire American production in 1914. In other words, what the Army bought in one year for use of four or five million soldiers would have been sufficient to supply the actual normal consumption of blankets by 100,000,000 American civilians for two and one-fourth years.

The soldiers were supplied with complete new equipment upon going to camp, and our policy required, on account of the great distance separating the Army from its base, that we should keep 90 days' supplies in France, 90 in transit, and 90 at home. The rule for clothing required that there should be for each man at the front a three months' reserve in France, a like reserve continuously in transit, and a two or three months' reserve in the United States. A wool coat, for example, lasts about three months in active service, and hence for every coat on a man's back in a camp in France three were needed in reserve as soon as he sailed for overseas; 2,000,000 men required something like 8,000,000 coats.

The following list of the total deliveries during the war of some of the common articles of clothing shows the greatness of the task. The cost of the articles listed was more than $1,000,000,000:

Wool coats		13,900,000
Overcoats		8,300,000

When the troop movement was speeded up in the spring of 1918 the margin on woolen clothing got dangerously narrow, and to secure these and other articles in sufficient quantity it became necessary in many cases for the Army to take control of all stages of the manufacturing process from assembling the raw materials to inspecting the finished product. For months before the armistice the War Department was the owner of all the wool in this country. Army needs were estimated, if the troop movement had continued, from September, 1918, to June, 1919, at 246,000,000 pounds of clean wool, while the amount allotted to civilian needs was only 15,000,000. Something like the same story might be told for 30,000 kinds of chemical articles which the Army purchased.

In one way or another the Army at war drew upon almost every one of the 344 industries recognized by the United States census. In some cases readjustments of machinery or a slight modified product was necessary. In many an improved product was demanded, while in practically all an enormous production was required. In the case of some articles the difficulties of quantity productions were combined with the problems of making something not before manufactured. Typical instances are the 5,400,000 gas masks and the 2,728,000 steel helmets produced before the end of November, 1918.

DISTRIBUTION OF MUNITIONS, SUPPLIES.

The problem of distribution was fully as difficult as that of procurement. For production, machinery already in existence could be utilized; for distribution, a new organization was necessary. In this country there were ample railroad facilities. A complete new organization was necessary for the purpose in France, whose main duty was to distribute munitions and supplies. It was called the "service of supply"—the S. O. S.—with headquarters at Tours. It was an army in fact behind the Army, and on the date the armistice was signed there were 386,000 soldiers, besides 31,000 German prisoners and thousands of civilian laborers furnished by the Allies, reporting to the commanding general of the services of supply. At the same time there were in the zone of the armies 160,000 noncombatant troops, the majority of whom were keeping in operation the lines of distribution of supplies to the troops at the front.

The proportion of noncombatants in the American Army never fell below 28 per cent; it often ran higher in the British Army. When there was the greatest pressure for men at the front, the work back of the lines took roughly about one man out of three. It was necessary to build in France 83 new ship berths, with warehouses and dock equipment, and to increase the carrying capacity of French railways by nearly 1,000 miles of new trackage, by switching facilities at crucial points, by new repair shops, roundhouses, and by new rolling stock. These things were done by the engineers.

The problems were not wholly solved, as there were never enough docks to prevent some loss of time by vessels waiting, but the capacity for handling American cargo was tripled from 10,000 tons per day in the spring of 1918 to 30,000 tons by November 11, and the waiting time for ships was shorter than in commercial practice. Nor were there ever wholly adequate railroad facilities, but with the help of locomotives and freight cars shipped from this side freight was shipped inland as fast as it was landed.

The supplies were carried on railroads from the ports to immediate or advanced depots, and spurs led up to the front, but the standard-gauge road did not extend to the danger zone of shell fire. Where danger of shelling began and because of rapidly changing needs of the shifting battle front, other means were used; narrow-gauge railroads, rails only 2 feet apart, were constructed for distributing supplies, and 538 miles of these roads were built, for which 406 narrow-gauge locomotives and 2,385 narrow-gauge cars were shipped from this country, in addition to the standard-gauge equipment. Beyond the range of the narrow-gauge railways motor trucks were employed and were used to an extent never before thought possible. The motor trucks saved the day at Chateau-Thierry by bringing troops up to strengthen and hold the breaking line.

The American Infantry division on the march with the trucks, wagons, and ambulances of its supply, ammunition, and sanitary trains stretches for a distance of 30 miles along the road; 650 trucks are allowed for a division by the table of organization. Need for trucks increased rapidly during the latter months of the war as the forces moved forward on the offensive away from their railway bases. The Army overseas never had all the trucks it needed during the war, due almost entirely to a shortage of ships. Trucks require an enormous amount of cargo space, and it is slow and difficult work to load them, and frequently embarkation officials loaded their ships rapidly with supplies needed still more urgently overseas, leaving the trucks behind.

The number of trucks sent over prior to the armistice was 40,000, and 33,000 of these had been received in France. They ranged in size from three-fourths of a ton to 5 tons.

Horses and wagons were used beyond the range of motor trucks, and the American armies were never adequately supplied with this equipment.

The shipment of animals overseas was discontinued in 1918 upon information that they could be purchased there, and then in the fall of 1918, when every ton of shipping was precious, the supply of foreign horses proved inadequate, and 23 of the Army's best cargo vessels had to be converted into animal transports. A horse uses as much ship space as 10 tons of cargo. In general, it may be said that the Army overseas never had enough means of transportation, although they had very large quantities and produced remarkable results with the supply they had.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE LINES.

To facilitate the transportation of supplies in France the Signal Corps had to establish a new system of communication, stringing its wires over nearly every part of France. They constructed new lines, leased certain lines from the French, and took over others from the Germans. At the time of the armistice the Signal Corps was operating 282 telephone exchanges and 133 complete telegraph stations. More than 100,000 miles of wire had been strung and the peak load of operation reached was 47,555 telegrams a day, averaging 60 words each.

CONSTRUCTION IN THE UNITED STATES.

Two hundred thousand workmen were kept continuously occupied during the war building factories, storage warehouses for supplies and cantonments for troops. This force was larger than the total strength of both northern and southern armies in the Battle of Gettysburg and was equal to our standing army at the beginning of the war. Building was required in every State in the Union, and the region of greatest activity was in the Northeast, the most densely populated section of the country and the center of munitions production.

The housing constructed had a capacity of 1,800,000 men, or more than the entire population of Philadelphia. The total expenditures in this enterprise to November 11, 1918, were in round numbers $800,000,000, or about twice the cost of the Panama Canal. The largest single item is the cost of the National Army cantonments, which was nearly one-quarter of the total. Ordnance Department projects, including the building of enormous powder, high explosive, and loading plants came second. The costs of construction were much higher than they would have been for slower work, and the outstanding feature of the accomplishment was its rapidity. Each of the contonments was completed in substantially 90 days, and it was this speed that made it possible to get the draft army under training before the winter of 1917 and made it available for the decisive action of the summer of 1918.

CONSTRUCTION IN AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES.

The construction program in France is comparable in magnitude and number of projects with that of the United States. Less new building was required for the shelter and the manufacture of munitions, but more for the development of port and railroad facilties and for the repair and operation of the complicated equipment of a modern army. The storage space constructed in France was twice the new capacity constructed at home. All construction work in France was performed by the Corps of Engineers under the service of supply. Materials were obtained in Europe as far as possible, sometimes at high prices. The Engineer Corps ran its own quarries and its own logging camps and its own sawmills. Only material that could not be obtained abroad—chiefly machinery and steel products—was purchased in the United States. Eight hundred and thirty-one projects had been undertaken up to the signing of the armistice, distributed generally over France, and the American Expeditionary Force left its trail in the shape of more or less permanent improvements over the greater part of France. The projects cluster most thickly around the ports used by American forces and the area on the southern end of the battle line.

FOOD AND CLOTHING AT THE FRONT.

The real test of the efficiency of the supply service comes when an army engages in battle. As measured by this test the work of feeding, clothing, and equipping the Army was well done, for in the main the expeditionary forces had what they needed. At no time was there a shortage of food. Soldiers sometimes went hungry, but the condition was local and temporary and occurred because of transportation difficulties during periods of active fighting or rapid movement when the units outran their supplies. The stocks of food on hand in depots in France were always adequate. The amounts on hand rose steadily in the winter and spring of 1918, and on May 1, when the American troops were first entering active fighting, the supplies were well over the 45-day line, which was considered the necessary reserve during the latter months of the war. At first, efforts were made to build up a 90-day supply to guard against the possibility of the lines of communication being cut, but as the menace of the submarine became less acute and the need of ship tonnage for other supplies became more pressing the required reserve was cut to 45 days, and at no time during the period of active operations did the reserve fall below that line.

In the matter of clothing, also, the supply service rose to the emergency, although at times many individual units were not able to procure immediately the needed supplies, but, as in the case of food, the difficulty was one of local transportation. The records show that during the six months of hard fighting from June to November the enlisted man in the American Expeditionary Force received, on the average, slicker and overcoat every five months; blanket, flannel shirt, and breeches, every two months; coat, every 79 days; drawers and undershirt, every 34 days; and woolen socks, every 23 days.

SMALL ARMS, RIFLES, MACHINE GUNS.

In the years immediately preceding the war, there was much discussion in the War Department and in the country at large of the need of increased military preparedness. Reference to the War Department reports for 1914, 1915, and 1916 shows that what was then considered as the best military and civilian opinion was agreed that the Army that would have to be called into the field in any large emergency was one of 500,000 men. In these reports attention was called to the fact that although our available resources in trained men, in airplanes, and in machine guns were entirely inadequate, our reserve stocks of rifles and small arms ammunition were sufficient for even a larger Army than the half million suggested.

There were on hand at the outbreak of hostilities nearly 600,000 Springfield rifles, model of 1903, which is probably the best Infantry rifle in use in any army. This number was sufficient for the initial equipment of an army of about 1,000,000 men. No one, of course, foresaw that we would be called upon to equip an army of nearly 4,000,000 men in addition to furnishing rifles for use of the Navy.

The available Springfields were used to equip the Regular Army and National Guard divisions that were first organized, and the 200,000 Krag-Jörgensen rifles on hand stored for an emergency were in good condition to be used for training purposes.

It was soon found that it would not be possible to increase the output of Springfields to much beyond a thousand per day, which was entirely insufficient, and it was then determined to manufacture an entirely new rifle to meet the deficiency.

The new rifle—model 1917—was designed, which resembled the British Enfield, being manufactured in several plants in this country sufficiently so that the plants could be rapidly converted to its manufacture, and it was chambered to use the same ammunition as is used in the Springfield, in the machine guns, and automatic rifles of American manufacture. The total output of Springfield rifles had increased to nearly 900,000 by the end of the war. The Enfields first came into production in August, 1917, and the output increased rapidly until it totaled in November, 1918, nearly 2,300,000.

The first divisons sent to France were equipped with the Springfields and about half the rifle ammunition used against the enemy by our troops was fired from Springfield rifles. The test of battle upheld its high reputation and also demonstrated that the American Enfield is a weapon of superior quality. The American troops were armed with rifles that were superior in accuracy and rapidity of fire to those used by either their enemy or their allies.

MACHINE GUNS.

The use of machine guns on a large scale was a development of the European war. In the case of the American forces, the figures are especially impressive. The Congress of 1912 sanctioned the allowance of the War Department of four machine guns per regiment, and in 1919, as a result of the experience of this war, the new Army plans provided for an equipment of 336 machine guns per regiment, an increase eighty-four times as great as the allowance of seven years earlier.

The Secretary of War in his annual report for 1916 called attention to the efforts being made to place our Army on a satisfactory footing with reference to machine guns, saying:

> Perhaps no invention has more profoundly modified the art of war than the machine gun. In the European war this arm has been brought into very great prominence. * * * When the Congress at the last session appropriated $12,000,000 for the procurement of machine guns, it seemed important, for obvious reasons, to free the air of the various controversies and to set at rest in as final a fashion as possible the conflicting claims of makers and inventors. A board was therefore created. A preliminary report has been made by this board, selecting the Vickers-Maxim type for heavy machine guns, recommending the purchase of a large supply of them, and fixing a date in May at which time exhaustive tests to determine the relative excellence of various types of light machine guns are to be made.

In accordance with these recommendations, 4,000 Vickers machine guns were ordered in December, 1916, and by the end of the next year 2,031 had been delivered. In further accord with the recommendations of the board, tests were made in May, 1917, of different types of heavy machine guns and light machine guns, now called automatic rifles. The Vickers gun proved satisfactory, but could not be put on a quantity production because of technical difficulties in the manufacture. A new gun, the heavy Browning, was selected in this test and adopted as the standard heavy machine gun. The light Browning, weighing only 15 pounds, was easily in the lead as an automatic rifle. The Lewis gun, too heavy for satisfactory use as an automatic rifle and incapable of the long-sustained fire necessary in a heavy gun, was found best adapted, with slight modification, for use as a flexible gun for aircraft. The Vickers gun had been used successfully in Europe as a synchronized gun on aircraft, but a new gun, the Marlin, was adapted to this purpose, releasing part of the early production of the Vickers gun for ground use. Later the modified form of the heavy Browning was designed for use as a synchronized gun for aircraft.

Production of all types mentioned was pressed, and because of the order for Vickers placed in 1916 our 12 first divisions were able to receive that weapon as their heavy machine gun. The trials made in May made possible a selection of suitable types of guns for every purpose, and the completion of the first light Brownings in February, 1918, and the heavy Brownings in April following.

The earliest needs of our troops in France were met by French Hotchkiss machine guns and Chauchat automatic rifles. Later divisions going over were provided with Vickers heavy guns and Chauchat automatic rifles. After July 1 divisions embarking were equipped with light and heavy Brownings, both of which guns met with immediate success and the approval of foreign officers, as well as our own.

Notwithstanding these guns were brought into production in February and April of 1918, they were not used in battle until September, because of a deliberate and most significant judgment on the part of Gen. Pershing, after careful tests had been made in Europe, who decided that the two new Brownings were so greatly superior to any machine guns in use by any of the armies on either side that the best course to follow would be to wait until several divisions could be equipped and a plentiful supply assured before using them in battle at all. This course was pursued lest the enemy might otherwise be able to procure one of the guns and reproduce them for use in battle against us. On this account the Brownings were not used in combat until they were used in large numbers in the Meuse-Argonne battle, where they amply justified the expectations of the American commander and the Ordnance Department.

The total number of machine guns of American manufacture produced to the end of 1918 of all kinds was 226,557, as shown in table below. In addition there were secured from the French and British 5,300 heavy machine guns, of which nearly all were French Hotchkiss, and 34,000 French Chauchat automatic rifles.

RIFLES AND MACHINE GUNS USED IN FRANCE.

The troops embarking for France carried with them their rifles, in some instances machine guns and automatic rifles, and, making proper allowance therefor in addition to what was shipped in bulk for replacement and reserves, it is found that about 1,775,000 rifles, 29,000 light Brownings, 27,000 heavy Brownings, and 1,500,000,000 rounds of rifle and machine-gun ammunition were shipped to France from this country before November 1. These were supplemented by smaller amounts received from the French and British, already mentioned. The actual use of American-made machine guns and automatic rifles in France is shown in the following table:

Use of American-made automatic arms in France.

	Used at the front.	Total, including training.
Light Browning	4,608	17,664
Heavy Browning	1,168	3,528
Vickers ground gun	2,340	2,860
Lewis aircraft	1,393	3,930
Marlin aircraft	1,220	3,084
Vickers aircraft	1,320	1,625

PISTOLS AND REVOLVERS.

There was an insistent demand from the beginning to the end of the war for pistols which was never fully met. Our Army was partly supplied with the Browning-Colt, a weapon already in production and more effective than the corresponding weapon used by any other army, but it could not be secured in sufficient numbers, and to meet the deficiency a revolver was designed using the same ammunition and placed in production in October, 1917. The troops in France were supplied with one or the other of these weapons for close combat so far as possible, but full equipment was never secured.

SMALL-ARMS AMMUNITION.

An adequate supply of small-arms ammunition was always available to provide for troops in service, and the complication due to the use of machine guns and automatic rifles of French caliber was successfully met. New types of ammunition were designed and produced to meet the special needs of the Air Service and of antiaircraft defense. Before the end of the war the American production of rifle ammunition amounted approximately to 3,500,000,000 rounds, of which 1,500,000,000 were shipped overseas. In addition 100,000,000 rounds were secured from the French and British.

ARMS AND THE MEN.

We never had nearly enough pistols and revolvers to equip fully our entire Army, and only during part of the months of the war were there enough for full equipment of the troops in France if all the pistols and revolvers had been there and issued. Of automatic rifles we had an adequate supply only in the last two months of the war. The supply of machine guns was inadequate up to July, and then so enormous was the production as to be sufficient before the end of the year to supply an army of 8,000,000 men. There was an initial surplus of rifles, then a deficit for six months, and after that a consistent surplus. Of automatic rifles, machine guns, and rifles there was always a surplus on hand in excess of what would have been required for the equipment of the expeditionary forces alone.

Only the Springfield and Enfield rifles are included in the computation of available rifles, although hundreds of thousands of Krag-Jörgensen and Russian rifles and some Canadian Ross rifles were used for training purposes.

PREPARATION FOR THE CAMPAIGN OF 1919.

There are many articles of munitions in which American production reached great amounts by the fall of 1918, but which were not used in large quantities at the front because the armistice was signed before big supplies of them reached France. These munitions, in the main, are articles of ordnance and aviation equipment, involving such technical difficulties of manufacture that the time of their production could not be shortened.

It is now realized that many millions of dollars were spent on Army equipment that was never used at the front, and it seems fair to question whether prudent foresight could not have avoided some of this expense.

The answer to the question is to be found in the record of a conference that took place in the little French town of Trois Fontaines on October 4, 1918, between Marshal Foch and the American Secretary of War, in which the allied commander in chief made final arrangements with the American Secretary as to the shipment of American troops and munitions in great numbers during the fall and winter preparatory for the campaign of 1919.

This was 1 day before the first German peace note and 38 days before the end of the war, but Marshal Foch was then calling upon America to make her great shipment of munitions and her supreme contribution of man power for the campaign of the following year.

TWO THOUSAND GUNS ON THE FIRING LINE.

We had on hand when war was declared a supply of light artillery sufficient to equip an army of 500,000 men that advocates of preparedness had agreed might have to take the field in the event of a large emergency. There were 900 pieces of field artillery then available, including 544 3-inch fieldpieces, enough to equip 11 divisions, 50 pieces being required for one division.

Initial plans, however, called for the formation of 42 divisions, which would require 2,100 3-inch fieldpieces immediately, and in addition a repair-shop reserve in France and a replacement reserve, which would increase the initial requirement to 3,200. To keep this army supplied the production of 100 guns per month would be required, but to get it going within a reasonable time would have required a productive capacity of three or four hundred guns per month, which shows the enormous industrial disadvantage suffered by a nation which enters a war without its stocks of military supplies for initial equipment on hand.

To meet the situation it was decided wisely, in June, 1917, to allot our guns for training purposes and to equip our forces in France with artillery conforming to the French and British standard calibers. This enabled us to procure guns where needed without the delay and danger incident to shipment overseas. We arranged to purchase from the French and British the artillery needed for our first divisions, and ship them in return equivalent amounts of steel, copper, and other raw materials, so that they could either manufacture guns for us in their factories or give us guns from their stocks and replace them with new ones made from our materials.

We also prepared to manufacture in our own plants artillery of like caliber for equipment of later divisions, and carried through successfully these plans. With no serious exceptions the guns from the British and French sources were secured as needed, but our own plants were slower in producing complete units ready for use than was expected.

In our factories the 3-inch guns of improved model ordered in September, 1916, were changed in caliber to use standard French ammunition, and became known as 75-mm. guns, model 1916. The British 18-pounder, then being produced in this country, was similarly redesigned and known as the 75-mm. gun, model 1917. Work was began on plans for the French 75-millimeter gun so as to produce it in American factories, but it was necessary to develop new manufacturing capacity. The same means were generally taken to secure supplies of other calibers of artillery. We also had to manufacture our guns with as little interference as possible with American production for the Allies. Of the enormous amount of equipment made necessary by the expansion of the Army to the contemplated force of 5,000,000 men, the artillery and artillery ammunition could be supplied with the least facility since the processes of its manufacture involved irreducible periods of time.

In spite of all handicaps, the actual production on United States Army orders only was 1,642 complete units of artillery before the armistice was signed, and this statement is hardly fair to the American record. The problem of planning the production of different component parts was not satisfactorily solved until about the end of the war, and the result was that by the production of a single component after the signing of the armistice hundreds of units were completed, and the totals for the month after the armistice are as large as those before October, although the work done thereafter was very much less. Up to the end of April, 1919, the number of complete artillery units produced in American plants was more than 3,000, or equal to all those purchased abroad from the French and the British up to the signing of the armistice.

The British did better than we did in the production of light artillery during their first 20 months of the war, but we excelled their record in our first 20 months in the production of heavy artillery and in both light and heavy artillery shell production.

They produced of complete units of light artillery 3,599, as against our 1,025, while we produced of complete units of heavy artillery 704, as against their 379; of light artillery shells, 28,774,000 rounds, as against their 23,328,000 rounds; of heavy artillery shells we produced 6,704,000, as against their 1,153,000.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The charge has repeatedly been made that as late as the latter part of June, 1918, there was not an American gun on the front in France; that the only artillery our troops had was that which was obtained from France, and also a few guns from the English; that we were very greatly handicapped in the campaign in the months of May, June, and July because of the lack of light artillery and heavy artillery, and were wholly dependent upon France; that perhaps in August or early in September we had some heavy artillery, but it had been taken from our war vessels. What is there in that charge so frequently made?

Mr. KIRBY. I have the matter arranged here definitely about all the artillery production and its use. I do not know as to the exact date, but I will come to the artillery feature in a few moments.

ARTILLERY AMMUNITION.

This was the biggest program of all in the magnitude of the quantities involved. Copper, steel, high explosives, and smokeless powder were required by the hundreds of millions of pounds. No firms were prepared to manufacture complete rounds and contracts had to be made for each component with the different manufacturers. For the shrapnel it was possible to use the design substantially as had previously been used in this country, but high explosive and gas shell proved more difficult. A large supply of American shell was produced, however, before the signing of the armistice and shipment to Europe in quantity had begun. The ammunition actually used against the enemy at the front was nearly all of French manufacture, but the approaching supply from America made possible a more free use of the French and British reserves. Our monthly production of artillery ammunition rose to over 2,000,000 rounds in August and over 3,000,000 in October, including United States calibers. By the end of 1918 the number of rounds of artillery ammunition produced in American plants was in excess of 20,000,000, as compared with 9,000,000 rounds secured from the French and British.

SMOKELESS POWDER AND EXPLOSIVES.

One of the striking contributions of the United States to the cause of the Allies was the enormous quantities of smokeless power and high explosives produced. Six hundred and thirty-two million pounds of smokeless powder was produced in the United States from April 1, 1917, to November 11, 1918—an amount almost exactly equal to the combined production of France and Great Britain. This was not all used by us, however. About half of the British supply for 1917 and more than a third of the French supply for 1918 was American made. This large supply was made possible in part by plants erected for the British in this country, but the American Ordnance Department added new plants, and as a result the established rate of production in this country was by the close of the war 45 per cent greater than the combined French and British rate. Additional new plants had to be erected for the production of high explosives—T. N. T., ammonium nitrate, picric acid, and others—and our established rate of production of high explosives at the close of the war was over 40 per cent larger than Great Britain's and nearly double that of France. The averages for August, September, and October for the three countries were:

	Pounds.
Great Britain	30,957,000
France	22,802,000
United States	43,888,000

POISON GAS.

When the clouds of chlorine suddenly enveloped the British and French lines in the Ypres salient early in 1915, a new weapon was introduced into the war—a terrible weapon, as evidenced by the fact that during the year 1918 from 20 to 30 per cent of all our battle casualties were due to gas. When we entered the war we had had no practical experience in manufacturing toxic gases, and had no existing facilities which could be readily converted to such use. At the signing of the armistice we were equipped to produce gas at a more rapid rate than France, England, or Germany.

The Government found it necessary to build its own chemical plants and to finance certain private firms. The majority of the producing plants, together with the plants for filling shells with gas, were built on a tract of land in the Aberdeen Proving Ground, Md., which came to be known as the Edgewood Arsenal. Production of gas and capacity for filling was at all times ahead of the supply of shell containers to be filled. Before the armistice more than 10,000 tons had been manufactured. In June, 1918, quantities of gas were shipped overseas for filling shells produced by the French; by the end of July no more French shells were available, and the surplus gas was sold to the French and British.

TRACTORS AND TANKS.

An innovation in the war, future development of which promises to be highly important, was the increased use of motor transportation. As applied to artillery, this meant the use of caterpillar tractors for hauling big guns. We had no suitable designs for caterpillar tractors of size appropriate for medium heavy artillery, but new 5 and 10 ton types were perfected and put in production and 1,100 shipped overseas before November 1. About 300 larger tractors were also shipped, and 300 more secured from the French and British.

The tank was an even more important application of the caterpillar tractor to war uses. In the case of the small 6-ton tanks, our effort was concentrated on improvement of design and development of large scale production for the 1919 campaign. We had produced 64 of this kind by the signing of the armistice, and, as showing the rate at which they were being produced, the total completed to March 3, 1919, was 778. The burden of active service in France was borne by 227 of these tanks received from the French. We did not attempt to produce the heavy 30-ton tanks, but concentrated our efforts upon the cooperative plan, by which we were to furnish the Liberty motors and the rest of the driving mechanism and the British the armor plate for 1,500 tanks for the 1919 campaign. About one-half the work on our part of this program had been completed when the armistice was signed. We received from the British 64 heavy tanks for immediate use in France.

ARTILLERY IN FRANCE.

We always had a sufficient supply of light artillery in France for the combat divisions that were ready for front-line service. This does not mean that when the division went into the battle they always had their artillery with them, for sometimes they did not. It was not because of lack of guns, however, but because it takes longer to train artillery troops than Infantry, and, under the exigencies of the battle conditions, American divisions were put into line a number of times supported by French and British artillery or without artillery.

When the armistice came the American forces not only had a sufficient number of 75's for the 29 combat divisions, but in addition enough more for 12 other divisions.

A careful study of the battle records of all divisions, with the number of days of service in battle, shows that in every 100 days that our combat divisions were in line they were supported by their own artillery for 75 days, by British artillery for 5 days, by French for 1½ days, and were without artillery 18½ days. Of these 18½ days, however, 18 days were in quiet sectors and only one-half of 1 day in active sectors. There are only three records of American divisions being in an active sector without artillery support. The total of these three cases amounts to one-half of 1 per cent, or about 14 hours out of the 100 days.

The most significant facts about our artillery in France are presented in the following table, which takes into account only light and heavy field artillery and does not include the small 57-millimeter guns or the trench mortars:

American artillery in France—Summary.

Total pieces of artillery received to Nov. 11	3,499
Number of American manufacture	477
American-made pieces used in battle	130
Artillery on firing line	2,251
Rounds of artillery ammunition expended	8,116,000
Rounds of ammunition of American manufacture expended	208,327
Rounds of American-made ammunition expended in battle	8,400

We had in round numbers in France 3,500 pieces of artillery, of which nearly 500 were made in America, and we used on the firing line 2,250, of which over 100 were made in this country.

Our tables of organization call for more heavy artillery for a given number of men than the French, British, or Germans actually used, and much more than had ever been thought advisable before this war. We should have had enough, even on this high standard, to meet the needs of the expeditionary forces if all our heavy field artillery had been of types suitable for use in France, but as we had some types that were considered suitable only for training there was a real shortage.

AIR SERVICE.

In this field public expectation was much exaggerated, due to the general ignorance shared by even the best-informed American authorities on aviation as to the requirements, other than simple flying ability, which the service exacts, and results were correspondingly disappointing. Before the war our Air Service had been small, struggling, and unpopular, and when war was declared we had but two aviation fields and 55 usable planes, which the National Advisory Committee on Aeronautics informed were of antiquated type, and all but 4 obsolete, and that 4 rapidly becoming so. This judgment was based on experience in Mexico, which had demonstrated serious defects in designs of American planes used there.

Immediately following the declaration of war the French Government urged the necessity of sending 4,500 aviators to France during the first year, if superiority in the air were to be insured. The European instructors who came over later to assist in the training made no pretense that this schedule was practicable, and the problem was to approximate it as nearly as possible.

To establish an elementary aviation service we had to create training planes, service planes, and develop aviators, and for this task we had no adequate organization of qualified personnel.

Training for aviation divides itself into three stages—elementary, advanced, and final. Elementary training, given to all candidates alike, includes physical training, hygiene, various practical and theoretical military subjects, the study of the structure and mechanism of airplanes and engines, signaling, observation, ground gunnery, and elementary flying to the point of doing simple flying alone.

Advanced training consisted in the specialized work necessary to qualify the student as a well-prepared all-around pilot or observer, as the case might be, ready to take up and master quickly any type of machine or any kind of observation or bombing duty which the exigencies of the service might necessitate.

Final training, given in Europe, was a short, intensive specialization on the particular type of machine or the particular military problem to which the pilot or observer was finally assigned.

At the date of the armistice there were 34 fields in operation, with 1,063 instructors; 8,602 men had been graduated from elementary training and 4,028 from advanced training. There were then actually in training 6,528 men, of whom 59 per cent were in elementary and 41 per cent in advanced training schools. There had been sent to the expeditionary forces more than 5,000 pilots and observers, of whom, at the date of the armistice, 2,226 were still in training and 1,238 were on flying duty at the front. The total personnel of our Air Service, including flying and nonflying officers, students, and enlisted men, increased from about 1,200 at the outbreak of the war to nearly 200,000 at the close.

TRAINING PLANES AND ENGINES.

With the French demand for aviators and only 55 training planes on hand, the production of training planes was the problem of greatest immediate concern. A few planes provided for in the 1917 appropriation were on order. Other orders were rapidly placed and deliveries of primary training planes were begun in June, 1917. To the date of the armistice 5,300 had been produced, including 1,600 of a type which was abandoned on account of unsatisfactory engines.

Advanced training planes reached quantity production early in 1918, and up to the armistice about 2,500 were delivered. Approximately the same number were purchased overseas for training the units with the expeditionary force.

European experience had demonstrated that more engines were required than planes for replacement, and in the proportion of about 2 to 1, and we adopted this for a standard for computation and placed orders for two types of elementary and three types of advanced training engines.

Quantity production of training engines was reached in 1917, and before the end of November, 1918, nearly 18,000 training engines and more than 9,500 training planes had been delivered. All but 1,346 of the engines were built in the United States, and of the training planes more than 8,000 were of American manufacture.

SERVICE PLANES.

As soon as war was declared and it became possible to learn the secrets of the great improvements that had been developed during the war in the design of airplanes used in battle a commission was sent abroad to select types of foreign-service planes for production here. The controlling factor in their selections was the necessity of redesigning the models to take American-made motors, since foreign engine production was insufficient to meet even the needs of the Allies. On this account and because of the rapidity with which the designs in smaller planes were changing the best allied authorities urged the concentration of American production on the more stable observation and bombing planes, leaving the production of the pursuit planes to the European factories, which were in closer contact with the front.

Four types of planes were selected for large-scale production. The De Haviland-4 (British), observation and day bombing machine; the Handley-Page (British), night bomber; the Caproni (Italian), night bomber; and the Bristol (British), two-seater fighter. This selection was approved by the French and British authorities. The De Havilands were acknowledged to be the fastest observation and bombing planes on the western front, and at the time of the armistice this plane was being produced at a rate of over 1,100 per month. A total of 3,227 had been completed, 1,885 had been shipped to France, and 667 to the zone of advance. The Handley-Page was redesigned to take two high-powered motors, passed its tests, and on the day of the armistice parts for 100 had been shipped abroad for assembly.

The Bristol fighter was a failure because the necessary changes to accommodate the American engine increased the weight so as to render the machine unsafe; and the Caproni, because of delay in receipt of the plans, was never produced, although successful tests of the new model were completed before the armistice.

We had of service planes at the end of November, 1918, nearly 7,900, of which nearly 4,100 were of American manufacture and the remaining 3,800 of foreign manufacture. In other words, of every 100 battle planes we received to the end of November, 1918, 52 were of American manufacture and 48 were made in foreign factories.

Two new models—the Le Pere two-seater fighter and the Martin bomber—were designed around the standard American motor, and in tests prior to the armistice each showed a performance superior to that of any known machine of its class. Neither, however, was completed in time for use in actual service.

SERVICE ENGINES.

The development of a high-powered motor adaptable to American methods of standardized production was made necessary by the rapid development of the heavier types of airplanes, together with the pressing need for a large scale production. This need was met in the Liberty 12-cylinder motor, which was America's chief contribution to aviation. After it had passed the experimental stage, production increased rapidly, the October output being over 4,200. The total production of Liberty engines to the date of the armistice was 13,574. Of this production 4,435 were shipped overseas to the expeditionary forces and 1,025 were delivered to the British, French, and Italian air services. It is a noteworthy fact that the British at the present time are requesting the delivery of Liberty motors to them in accordance with arrangements made during the war.

Other types of service engines, including the Hispano-Suiza 300-horsepower, the Bugatti, and the Liberty eight-cylinder, were under development when hostilities ceased. The Hispano-Suiza 180-horsepower had reached quantity production, 469 of this type were produced, of which about one-half were shipped overseas for use in foreign-built pursuit planes.

Up to the end of November, 1918, the total number of service engines secured was in excess of 22,000. More than 16,000, or 73 per cent, were from American sources and less than 6,000 from foreign sources.

RAW MATERIALS.

The American and allied airplane programs called for quantities of certain raw materials which threatened to exhaust the supply. This was true of spruce and fir, lubricating oils, linen, dopes, and mahogany. To meet the spruce and fir shortage, labor battalions were organized and placed in the forests of the west coast, and new kiln processes were developed which seasoned the lumber rapidly without loss of strength and resiliency. Approximately 174,000,000 feet of spruce and fir were delivered, more than two-thirds of which went to the Allies.

Castor oil was at first the only satisfactory lubricant for airplane motors, and the limited supply was far short of the prospective demand, but the situation was met by planting a large acreage of castor beans and the development of a mineral-oil substitute.

There was an acute shortage of linen for the wings of planes to meet, and a fabric of long-fiber cotton was developed which proved superior to linen.

The standard "dope" used by the Allies to cover the wings of their planes, making them air and water tight, was limited and highly inflammable. A substitute dope, far less inflammable and of a more plentiful basic material, was produced.

Mahogany for propellers was partially replaced by walnut, oak, cherry, and ash, and by improved seasoning processes excellent results were secured.

ACCESSORIES.

Few facilities and little experience existed at the beginning of the war for the development of many of the delicate instruments and intricate mechanisms required in the equipment of service planes. Intensive research brought some notable results, of which several deserve especial mention. They are:

The oxygen mask, equipped with telephone connections, which enabled the flier to endure the rarified air at any altitude which his plane could reach without losing speaking contact with his companions.

The military parachute, which was developed to unprecedented safety. This was used principally for escape from burning balloons, and was improved so that it would bring down safely the entire balloon basket with its load. During the entire war there was not an American casualty due to parachute failure.

The electric-heated clothing for aviators on high-altitude work. The electric suit, developed in the latter months of the war and used at the front, was lined with insulated coils through which current was driven by means of a small dynamo actuated by a miniature propeller driven by the rush of the plane through the air.

Long-focus light-filtration cameras by which good photographs could be taken through haze from altitudes of 3 miles or more. Primary credit for this belongs to Europe, but America improved the mechanism and standardized the design for quantity production.

The wireless telephone, by which the aviator is enabled to converse easily with other planes and with ground stations. This development came too late to be of any substantial use at the front, but its value for peace as well as for any future war is obvious.

BALLOONS.

In this field American manufacturers achieved a great relative success. Before the armistice we had produced 642 observation balloons and had received 20 from the French, 43 of our balloons had been destroyed, and 45 given to the French and British, leaving us with 574 at the end of the war. On the same date the Belgian army had 6, the British 43, the French 72, and the Germans 170 on the western front. These figures show that at the end of the war we had twice as many observation balloons as the enemy and the Allies combined had at the front.

FORTY-FIVE SQUADRONS AT THE FRONT.

The American pilots of the Lafayette Escadrille were transferred from the French to the American service December 26, 1917, flying as civilians until formally commissioned in late January, 1918. They were then attached to and served with the French Fourth Army, operating over Rheims.

In addition to the purely American operations, two full squadrons were attached to the British Royal Air Force in March and June, respectively, of 1918, remaining with the British throughout the war, and participated in the following engagements: The Picardy drive, Ypres, Noyon-Montdidier, Viellers, Bray-Rosieres-Roye, Arras, Bapaume, Canal du Nord, and Cambrai.

The strictly American aviation operations started in the middle of March, 1918, with the patroling of the front at Villeneuve-les-Vertus by an American pursuit squadron using planes of the French-built Nieuport-28 type. By the middle of May squadrons of all types—pursuit, observation, and bombing, as well as balloon companies—were in operation over a wide front. These squadrons were equipped with the best available types of British and French built service planes.

The squadrons were of four types: Observation squadrons, whose business it is to make observations, take photographs, and direct artillery fire; pursuit squadrons, using light fighting planes to protect the observation planes at their work, to drive the enemy from the air, or to "strafe" marching columns by machine-gun fire; the day bombers, carrying heavier bomb loads for the destruction of strategic enemy works.

In April the American forces just going into active sectors had three squadrons, two for observation and one for pursuit. Their strength totaled 35 planes. In May the squadrons were increased to nine. The most rapid growth occurred after July, when American De Haviland planes were becoming available in quantity for observation and day bombing service, and by November the number of squadrons increased to 45, with a total of 740 planes in action.

The equipment of American squadrons was in the early months entirely of French and British manufacture. American De Haviland-4 planes were first used at the front on August 10, and the number in service increased rapidly from that time on. Of the total 2,698 planes sent to the zone of advance, 667, or one-quarter, were of American make, and the proportion was rapidly increasing at the time of the signing of the armistice. Of the 2,031 planes from foreign sources sent forward, about nine-tenths were French. The planes sent to the zone of advance are approximately two-thirds of the service planes received by the American Expeditionary Forces, the other third being in back areas.

The rapid rate of destruction of planes at the front is illustrated by the fact that out of the 2,698 planes dispatched to the zone of advance only 1,162 remained at the time of the signing of the armistice.

IMPORTANT OPERATIONS.

The three major operations, marking the critical points in American participation in the war, also furnish a comparison indicating the growth of the American air forces in action. These are: The second battle of the Marne, St. Mihiel, and the Meuse-Argonne.

CHATEAU-THIERRY—JULY.

The Germans had at the start a pronounced superiority in the air on the Chateau-Thierry-Soissons front. The American Air Service succeeded, however, in establishing the lines of contact with enemy airmen from 3 to 10 miles within the enemy's lines, photographed the entire front and the terrain deep behind the lines, and played an important part in putting German air forces on the defensive. The German concentration for the attack of July 15 was reported in detail and the location of the German reserves established, while the secrecy of the allied mobilization for the counterattack was maintained and the Germans surprised. The American forces employed consisted of four pursuit squadrons, three observation squadrons, and two balloon companies.

ST. MIHIEL—SEPTEMBER.

In capturing the St. Mihiel salient the American First Army was aided and protected by the largest concentration of air force ever made, of which approximately one-third were American and the other two-thirds were French, British, and Italian squadrons operating under American command. Throughout this operation the German back areas were kept under bombardment day and night; their reserves and ammunition dumps were located for the American long-range artillery; propaganda designed to disaffect enemy personnel was dropped; record was made by photograph of every movement of the enemy's lines and reserves, such information being frequently delivered to headquarters in finished photographs within half an hour of its occurrence; and fast pursuit planes armed with machine guns flew low over the German lines, firing directly into his infantry.

Day bombers and corps and artillery observers were forced to fly low on account of the fog which hampered all the day operations, greatly reduced the visibility, and made infantry liaison especially difficult. This accounts for the fact that some trouble was experienced by the Infantry with German "strafing" planes.

The American air force employed consisted of 12 pursuit squadrons, 12 observation squadrons, 3 bombing squadrons, and 15 balloon companies. This large force performed an amount of flying approximately three times as great as was done during the Chateau-Thierry operations. During the last two weeks of July the flying time was more than 1,000 hours per week. The week of the St. Mihiel offensive it rose to nearly 4,000 hours.

MEUSE-ARGONNE—SEPTEMBER TO NOVEMBER.

The Meuse-Argonne engagement covered a wider front and a more extended period of time and no such heavy instantaneous concentration of planes as was made at St. Mihiel was possible. In this operation, moreover, less assistance was rendered by French and British fliers. The American force used during the engagement was considerably larger than at St. Mihiel. The losses were heavy during the six weeks' struggle, but replacements were brought forward so rapidly that at the last stage of the action the available American strength was greater than at the start. American air activities continued during the Argonne fighting on the same scale as during the St. Mihiel offensive. At the signing of the armistice there were on the front 20 pursuit squadrons, 18 observation squadrons, and 7 squadrons of bombers; with 1,238 flying officers and 740 service planes. There were 23 balloon companies also.

The final test of battle discloses that American aviators brought down in the course of their few months activity 755 enemy planes and lost in combat 357 planes. We lost 43 balloons and destroyed 71 German balloons.

TWO HUNDRED DAYS OF BATTLE.

American troops saw service in practically every stretch of the western front from the British lines in Belgium to inactive sectors in the Vosges. On October 2, 1917, the Americans entered the line in the quiet Toul sector and from that date to the armistice American units were somewhere in line almost continuously.

Two out of every three of the 2,084,000 soldiers who reached France engaged in battle; 1,390,000 saw active service in the front line. Our combat forces were organized into divisions, the largest on the western front, consisting, as already noted, of about 28,000 officers and men and 12,250 rifles to a division. The British divisions numbered about 15,000 and the French and German about 12,000 each. Of our 42 divisions 29 took part in active combat service while the others were used for replacements or were just arriving during the last month of hostilities. Of the 29 fighting divisions 7 were Regular Army divisions, 11 were organized from the National Guard, and 11 made up of National Army troops. American combat divisions were in battle for 200 days, from the 25th of April, 1918, when the first Regular divisions after long training in quiet sectors entered an active sector on the Picardy front, until the signing of the armistice. During the 200 days they were engaged in 13 major operations, of which 11 were joint enterprises with the French, British, and Italians, and 2 were distinctly American.

At the time of their greatest activity, in the second week of October, all 29 American divisions were in action and then held 101 miles of front, or 23 per cent of the entire allied battle line. From the middle of August until the end of the war they held during the greater part of the time a front longer than that held by the British. Their strength tipped the balance of man power in favor of the Allies, so that from the middle of June, 1918, to the end of the war the allied forces were superior in number to those of the enemy.

The Germans had an actual superiority of 324,000 riflemen on the western front on April 1, and their strength increased until June, when it began to drop. The allied strength gained steadily with the constantly growing American forces until it became superior in June, and by November 1 the allied rifle strength had a superiority over the Germans of more than 600,000 rifles.

The advances in battle of our divisions amounted to 485 miles, an average advance for each division of 17 miles, and nearly all of it against desperate enemy resistance. They captured 63,000 prisoners, 1,378 pieces of artillery, 708 trench mortars, and 9,650 machine guns. In June and July they helped to shatter the enemy advance toward Paris and to turn retreat into a triumphant offensive. At St. Mihiel they pinched off in a day an enemy salient which had been a constant menace to the French line for four years. In the Argonne and on the Meuse they carried lines which the enemy was determined to hold at any cost and cut the enemy lines of communication and supply for half the western battle front.

In January American troops were holding 10 kilometers, or 6¼ miles, of front in quiet sectors. In April their line had lengthened to 50 kilometers. In July this figure was doubled, and in September tripled. The high point was reached in October, with 29 divisions in line, extending over a front of 162 kilometers, or 101 miles, nearly one-quarter of the entire western front.

THIRTEEN BATTLES.

The war on the western front was in effect a single battle, and it is difficult to cut up the year and 22 days in which it was waged into well-defined battles. Certain major operations, however, may be so distinguished as phases of the greater struggle, and 13 such operations have been recognized in which American units were engaged, of which 12 took place on the western front and 1 in Italy.

These battles are named and the number of Americans engaged shown in the following table:

GERMAN OFFENSIVE.

The campaign of 1918 opened with the Germans on the offensive and in a series of five great drives of unprecedented violence the imperial great general staff sought to break the allied line and end the war. These five drives took place in five successive months, beginning in March, each being timed to take advantage of the light of the moon that month.

The first drive opened on March 21, on a 50-mile front across the old battle field of the Somme. In 17 days of fighting the Germans advanced their lines beyond Noyon and Montdidier and were within 12 miles of the important railroad center of Amiens, with its great stores of British supplies. In this battle, also known as the Picardy offensive, approximately 2,200 American troops, serving with the British and French, were engaged.

The attack upon Amiens had been but partially checked when the enemy struck again to the north in the Armentieres sector and advanced for 17 miles up the valley of the Lys. A small number of Americans, serving with the British, participated in the Lys defensive.

For their next attack (May 27) the Germans selected the French front along the Chemin des Dames, north of the Aisne. The line from Rheims to a little east of Noyon was forced back. Soissons fell, and on May 31 the enemy had reached the Marne Valley, down which he was advancing in the direction of Paris. At this critical moment our Second Division, together with elements of the Third and Twenty-eighth Divisions, were thrown into the line. They blocked the German advance at Chateau-Thierry, and they rendered vital assistance in stopping perhaps the most dangerous of the German drives. The Second Division not only halted the enemy on its front, but also recaptured from him the strong tactical positions of Bouresches, Belleau Wood, and Vaux.

The enemy had by his offensives established two salients threatening Paris. He now sought to convert them into one by a fourth terrific blow delivered on a front of 22 miles, between Montdidier and Noyon. The reinforced French Army resisted firmly, and the attack was halted after an initial advance of about 6 miles. Throughout this operation (June 9–15) the extreme left line of the salient was defended by our First Division. Even before the drive began the division had demonstrated the fighting qualities of our troops by capturing and holding the town of Cantigny (May 28).

There followed a month of comparative quiet, during which the enemy reassembled his forces for his fifth onslaught. On July 15 he attacked simultaneously on both sides of Rheims, the eastern corner of the salient he had created in the Aisne drive. To the east of the city he gained little. On the west he crosed the Marne, but made slight progress. His path was everywhere blocked. In this battle 85,000 American troops were engaged—the Forty-second Division to the extreme east in Champagne and the Third and Twenty-eighth to the west near Chateau-Thierry.

ALLIED OFFENSIVE.

The turning point of the war had come. The great German offensives had been stopped. The initiative now passed from Ludendorff to Marshal Foch, and a series of allied offensives began, destined to roll back the German armies beyond the French frontier. In this continuous allied offensive there may be distinguished six phases, or major operations, in which the American Expeditionary Forces took part. In four of the six operations the American troops engaged were acting in support of allied divisions and under the command of the generals of the Allies.

The moment chosen by Marshal Foch for launching the first counter offensive was July 18, when it was clear that the German Champagne-Marne drive had spent its force. The place chosen was the uncovered west flank of the German salient from the Aisne to the Marne. The First, Second, Third, Fourth, Twenty-sixth, Twenty-eighth, Thirty-second, and Forty-second American Divisions, together with selected French troops, were employed. When the operation was completed (August 6) the salient had been flattened out and the allied line ran from Soissons to Rheims along the Vesle.

Two days later the British struck at the Somme salient, initiating an offensive which, with occasional breathing spells, lasted to the date of the armistice. American participation in this operation was intermittent. From August 8 to 20 elements of the Thirty-third Division, which had been brigaded for training with the Australians, were in the line and took part in the capture of Chippilly Ridge. Later the Twenty-seventh and Thirtieth Divisions, who served throughout with the British, were brought over from the Ypres sector and used in company with Australian troops to break the Hindenburg line at the tunnel of the St. Quentin Canal (September 20 to October 20).

In the meantime simultaneous assaults were in progress at other points on the front. On August 18 Gen. Mangin began the Oise-Aisne phase of the great allied offensive. Starting from the Soisson-Rheims line, along which they had come to rest, August 6, the French armies advanced by successive stages to the Aisne, to Laon, and on November 11 were close to the frontier. In the first stages of this advance they were assisted by the Twenty-eighth, Thirty-second, and Seventy-seventh American Divisions, but by September 15 all of these were withdrawn for the coming Meuse-Argonne offensive of the American Army.

The day after the opening of the Oise-Aisne offensive the British launched the first of a series of attacks in the Ypres sector, which continued with some interruptions to the time of the armistice, and may be termed the "Ypres-Lys offensive." Four American divisions at different times participated in this operation. The Twenty-seventh and Thirtieth were engaged in the recapture of Mount Kemmel, August 31 to September 2. The Thirty-seventh and Ninety-first were withdrawn from the Meuse-Argonne battle and dispatched to Belgium, where they took part in the last stages of the Ypres-Lys offensive, October 31 to November 11.

With the organization of the American First Army, on August 10, under the personal command of Gen. Pershing, the history of the American Expeditionary Forces entered upon a new stage. The St. Mihiel (September 12–16) and Meuse-Argonne (September 26 to November 11) offensives were major operations, planned and executed by American generals and American troops.

In addition to the 12 operations above mentioned, American troops participated in the Battle of Vittorie-Veneto (October 24 to November 4), which ended in the rout of the Austrian Army.

THE BATTLE OF ST. MIHIEL.

The first distinctly American offensive was the reduction of the St. Mihiel salient, carried through from September 12 to September 15, largely by American troops and wholly under the orders of the American commander in chief.

In the attack the American troops were aided by French colonial troops and also by French and British air squadrons. The attack began at 5 a. m., after four hours of artillery preparation of great severity, and was immediately successful. Before noon half the distance between the bases of the salient had been covered, and the next morning troops of the First and Twenty-sixth Divisions met at Vigneulles, cutting off the salient within 24 hours from the beginning of the movement. Comparisons between this operation and the Battle of Gettysburg show the magnitude of the action. About 550,000 Americans were engaged at St. Mihiel, and the Union forces at Gettysburg numbered approximately 100,000. St. Mihiel set a record for concentration of artillery fire, consuming more than 1,000,000 rounds of ammunition in four hours. In three days at Gettysburg the Union artillery fired 33,000 rounds.

The St. Mihiel offensive cost only about 7,000 casualties, less than one-third of the Union losses at Gettysburg, and there were captured 16,000 prisoners and 443 guns.

THE BATTLE OF THE MEUSE-ARGONNE.

The purpose of the Meuse-Argonne offensive was, as said by Gen. Pershing in his report of November 20, 1918, "to draw the best German divisions to our front and to consume them." Every available American division was thrown against the enemy and every available German division was thrown in to meet them. At the end of 47 days of continuous battle our divisions had consumed the German divisions.

The objective of the American attack was the Sedan-Mezieres Railroad, the main line of supply for the German forces on the major part of the western front. To cut this line would force a retirement on the whole front, which would include, moreover, the evacuation of the Briey iron fields, which the Germans had been using to great advantage to supplement their iron supply. The defense of the positions threatened was of such importance as to warrant the most desperate measures for resistance, and when the engagement was evidently impending the commander of the German Fifth Army called on his forces for unyielding resistance, telling them loss of the battle meant disaster to the fatherland. On the first day, September 26, the lines were advanced, and in the next two days the resistance became more stubborn, each side throwing in more and more of its man power until there were no more reserves. Many German divisions went into action twice and some three times, until through losses they were far under strength. Foot by foot all through October the American troops pushed back the best of the German divisions, and on November 1 the last stage of the offensive began. The enemy power began to break. American troops forced their way to the east bank of the Meuse and made even more rapid progress toward the north, and in seven days reached the outskirts of Sedan and cut the railroad, making the German line untenable.

In the meantime—October 2–28—our Second and Thirty-sixth Divisions had been sent to assist the French, who were advancing in Champagne beside our drive in the Argonne. The liaison detachment between the two armies was for a time furnished by the Ninety-second Division.

The Meuse-Argonne in some ways offers an interesting resemblance to the Battle of the Wilderness in the Civil War, fought from May 5 to 12, 1864. Both battles were fought over a terrain covered with tangled woods and underbrush. The Wilderness was regarded a long battle, marked by slow progress against obstinate resistance, with very heavy casualties. The similarity ends here. The Meuse-Argonne lasted six times as long as the Battle of the Wilderness. Twelve times as many American troops were engaged as were on the Union side. They used in the action ten times as many guns and fired one hundred times as many rounds of artillery ammunition. The actual weight of the ammunition fired was greater than that used by the Union forces during the entire Civil War. The casualties were about four times as heavy as among the Northern troops in the Battle of the Wilderness.

The Battle of the Meuse-Argonne was beyond compare the greatest ever fought by American troops, and there have been few, if any, greater battles in the history of the world. Some of the more important statistics of the engagement are presented in the following table:

American data for the Meuse-Argonne Battle.

Guns employed in attack	2,417
Rounds of artillery ammunition fired	4,214,000

COMBAT DIVISIONS.

Twenty-nine combat divisions achieved the successes and bore the losses of active operations, but their achievements can not be told in the limits of this account. The First Division was first in line and first to enter an active sector reaching France in June, 1917; went into line in October and into an active sector in April, 1918. The Seventy-seventh National Army Division, composed largely of troops from New York City, made the greatest advance—a total of 71½ kilometers, or nearly 45 miles. The Second Division took 12,026 prisoners, nearly twice the number captured by any other division. Those of the 29 divisions—the Sixth, Eighty-first, and Eighty-eighth—were still serving their apprenticeship and had not seen much severe fighting at the time of signing the armistice. The Americans suffered 286,000 battle casualties and lost in prisoners taken by the Germans 4,434, a small number as compared with the enormous price paid by the nations at the sides of whose armies we fought.

The Ninety-third Division, made up of negro soldiers from National Guard units from various States, is worthy of special comment. It has not been listed among the combat divisions, as it was always incomplete, being without its artillery and some other units. It was brigaded with the French from the time of its arrival in France, in the spring of 1918, until the signing of the armistice, and its service in the line was fully as long as that of many of the so-called combat divisions, and it suffered 2,583 casualties, with 574 killed.

The following diagram, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, shows the casualties suffered in each division:

Diagram—Casualties suffered by each division.

Of the casualties, 8,641 occurring among "other units," there is one most interesting group some of the members of which are included in troops not in divisions, and the rest among the casualties of replacement and depot divisions. These are the men who deserted to the front. They were absent without leave from their organizations in the zone of supplies or in the training areas, and made their way to the battle line where many took part in the battle and some were killed and wounded. These cases were so numerous that Gen. Pershing allowed arrangements by which men who had rendered good service behind the lines could, as a reward, secure opportunity to go to the front and engage in the fighting.

HEALTH AND CASUALTIES.

Of every 100 American soldiers and sailors who took part in the war with Germany, 2 were killed or died of disease during the period of hostilities. In the Northern Army during the Civil War the number was about 10. Among the other great nations in this war, between 20 and 25 in each 100 called to the colors were killed or died. American losses in this war were relatively one-fifth as large as during the Civil War and less than one-tenth as large as in the ranks of the enemy or among the nations associated with us.

The war was undoubtedly the bloodiest which has ever been fought. One possible competitor might be the Crimean War, in which the casualty rate per 100 men was equally large. The British forces in the Crimean War lost 22 of every 100 men, the French 31, the Turkish 27, and the Russian 43. More than four-fifths of the losses were, however, deaths from disease, while in the recent war with Germany disease deaths were inconsiderable as compared with battle deaths. The forces engaged in the Crimean War were, moreover, much smaller.

The total battle deaths in this war were greater than all the deaths in all wars for more than 100 years previous. From 1793 to 1914 total deaths in war may safely be estimated at something under 6,000,000. Battle deaths alone from 1914 to 1918 totaled about 7,450,000. An estimate of the losses of the principal nations engaged is shown in the following table, the figures being approximate in some cases:

Battle deaths in armies engaged in present war, 1914–1918.

Russia	1,700,000
Germany	1,600,000
France	1,385,300
Great Britain	900,000
Austria	800,000
Italy	330,000
Turkey	250,000
Serbia and Montenegro	125,000
Belgium	102,000
Roumania	100,000
Bulgaria	100,000
United States	48,900
Greece	7,000
Portugal	2,000
Total	7,450,200

Only deaths resulting directly from action are included. The total deaths from all causes is very much larger, as some of the armies lost more heavily from disease and privation than from battle.

It appears that Russia had the heaviest losses, in spite of the fact that she withdrew from the war after the fall of 1917. American losses are third from the bottom of the list. German losses were thirty-two times as great as the losses of the United States, the French twenty-eight times, and the British eighteen times as large; but our armies were only engaged in the heavy fighting for 200 days. Our death rate reached more than 6,000 a week in the Meuse-Argonne battle.

The chances of death are shown to be much greater in the Infantry than in any other branch of the service. Of each 1,000 men enlisted in the Infantry 46 were killed in action or died of wounds. The officers show even a higher rate.

WOUNDED, PRISONERS, AND MISSING.

For every man who was killed in battle seven others were wounded, taken prisoner, or reported missing. The total battle casualties in the expeditionary forces are shown in the table below. The number who died of wounds was only 6 per cent as large as the number wounded. About 85 per cent of the men sent to hospitals on account of injuries were returned to duty. About half the wounded were reported as slightly wounded, and many of them would not have been recorded as casualties in previous wars. Except for 297 who died, all the prisoners shown in the table have now been returned.

Battle casualties in the American Expeditionary Forces.

Killed in action	34,180
Died of wounds	14,729
Total dead		48,909
Wounded severely	80,130
Wounded slightly	110,544
Wounded, degree undetermined	39,400
Total wounded		230,074
Missing in action		2,913
Taken prisoner		4,434
Grand total		286,330

The number of men reported as missing has been steadily reduced from a total of 22,724, exclusive of prisoners, to the figure 2,913 shown in the table. This reduction has gone on without clearing any case as dead except on evidence establishing beyond doubt the fact of death. Only 22 per cent of those who were originally reported as missing in action have now been returned as dead. The largest number were found in hospitals, while a considerable number returned to duty after being lost from their units.

The work of the Central Records Office of the American Expeditionary Forces in clearing up the cases of men listed as missing has been more successful than that done in any of the other armies or in any previous great war. When the records are finally completed there will be very few American soldiers unaccounted for. The missing lists of the other nations still run into the hundreds of thousands.

BATTLE AND DISEASE LOSSES.

This is our first war that shows a lower death rate from disease than from battle. The total number of lives lost in both Army and Navy from the declaration of war to May 1, 1919, is 122,500. Deaths in the Army, including marines attached to it, were 112,432. About two-thirds of these deaths occurred overseas. Almost exactly half the losses were from disease, and if the comparison be limited to the expeditionary forces, battle losses were more than twice as large as deaths from disease.

Since the time of the Mexican War a steady improvement has been made in the health of troops in war operations. The death rate from disease in the Mexican War was 110 per year per thousand men. In the Civil War it was reduced to 65 and in the Spanish War to 26, while the rate in the expeditionary forces in this war was 19. The battle rate of 53 for the overseas forces is higher than in any previous war—higher than in the Civil War, because all the fighting was concentrated in one year, while in the Civil War it stretched over four years. The death rates in this war for the total forces under arms, both in the United States and France, from the beginning of war to May 1, 1919, were 13 for battle and 15 for disease.

THE CONTROL OF DISEASE.

The remarkably low disease death rate in this war is attributable, chiefly: (1) To the service of a highly trained medical personnel, (2) compulsory vaccination of the entire Army against typhoid fever, (3) thorough camp sanitation and control of drinking water, and (4) adequate provision of hospital facilities.

There were at the beginning of the war 2,089 commissioned officers, including the reserves. During the war 31,251 physicians from civil life were commissioned in the Medical Corps. This number included leaders of medical science who have not only made possible the application of the most recent advances of medicine in the prevention and cure of disease, but have themselves made new discoveries during the course of the war, resulting in great saving of life in our own and other armies.

During the war the intestinal diseases, such as dysentery, the typhoids, bubonic plague, cholera, and typhus that have ravaged and destroyed armies in the past, have been practically eliminated as causes of death. During this war, up to May 1, 1919, a total of only 2,328 cases of typhoid fever have been reported, and only 227 deaths from this cause. The result is due to the compulsory vaccination of every man who entered the Army and to excellent sanitary conditions. The other intestinal diseases were similarly of little effect as causes of death or have not occurred at all.

It was expected that with careful control exercised epidemics of these diseases would be avoided in the United States; but in the expeditionary forces, where troops were quartered in temporary camps, billeted with civilians, or actively engaged in prolonged battle, the reduction of these diseases is a notable achievement in sanitary control.

Pneumonia has been the greatest cause of death. More than 40,000 died of the disease. Of these deaths probably 25,000 resulted from the influenza-pneumonia pandemic which swept through every camp and cantonment in this country and caused thousands of deaths in the expeditionary forces. Up to September 14, 1918, only 9,840 deaths from disease had occurred in the Army, and the death rate for the period of the war up to that time was only 5 per year for each 1,000 men. During the eight weeks from September 14 to November 8, 316,089 cases of influenza and 53,449 of pneumonia were reported among troops in this country. The death rate reached its highest point in the second week in October, when 4 out of each 1,000 troops under arms in this country died. The two other diseases which offered difficult problems for the medical force were measles and spinal meningitis. Meningitis caused nearly 2,000 deaths, ranking next to pneumonia. Both of these contagious diseases were largely the result of bringing numbers of men together in the confinement of camps and cantonments where the control of contagion is difficult.

VENEREAL DISEASE.

Great success was also experienced in the control of the venereal diseases. A comprehensive program of education, together with medical prophylaxis, has produced unusual results. While these diseases have continued to be the most frequent cause of admissions to the sick report and the greatest source of noneffectiveness in the Army, a large proportion of the cases were contracted before entering the Army. A special study of all new cases of venereal diseases reported at five large cantonments, Lee, Va., Dix, N. J., Upton, N. Y., Meade, Md., and Pike, Ark., during the year ending May 21, 1919, shows that of 48,167 cases treated 96 per cent were contracted before entering the Army and only 4 per cent after.

The record for the forces overseas is particularly noteworthy. There few fresh recruits entered the Army from civil life, and the conditions more accurately show the effects of the Army control exercised.

There was steady reduction of noneffectiveness from venereal diseases in the Army overseas up to September, 1918. At the beginning of that month there was less than 1 venereal patient in hospitals among each 1,000 men. Weekly inspections covering about 85 per cent of the total number of troops overseas during the six months after the armistice disclosed that there was less than 1 new case in each 1,000 men examined. The actual average was 1 new case each week among each 2,630 men examined.

HOSPITALIZATION.

At the beginning of the war a program of hospital construction was entered upon, then by some regarded as extravagant, with the intent that the Army should not lack facilities for the care of its sick. The following table summarizes the hospital construction in the United States:

Army hospital construction in the United States.

	Number.	Normal bed capacity.
New hospitals	62	88,468
Leased buildings and converted Army posts	39	29,387
Post hospitals remodeled	48	6,035
Total	149	123,890

The figures are exclusive of numerous small hospitals already in Army use. In addition, more than 200 hospitals were put in operation overseas. On December 1, 1918, there were available in Army hospitals 399,510 beds, or one bed to every nine men in the Army. Of these, 287,290 were overseas and 112,220 were in this country.

The hospital capacity was exceeded in this country only during the influenza epidemic, when it became necessary to take over barracks for hospital purposes.

The overseas record was even better. Except during two weeks in October, at the height of the attack on the Hindenburg line, the number of patients did not exceed the normal bed capacity of the hospitals, and at that time there were approximately 60,000 unused emergency beds. Over 130,000 patients have been evacuated from the expeditionary forces to hospitals in this country.

TOTAL WAR EXPENDITURES A MILLION DOLLARS AN HOUR.

The war cost the United States considerably more than $1,000,000 an hour for a period of 25 months, from April, 1917, through April, 1919. Treasury disbursements during the period reached a total of $23,500,000,000, of which $1,650,000,000 may be charged to the normal expenses which would have occurred in time of peace. The balance may be counted as the direct money cost of the war to the end of April, 1919, a sum of $21,850,000,000. The figure is twenty times the prewar national debt. It is nearly large enough to pay the entire cost of our Government from 1791 up to the outbreak of the European war. Our expenditure in this war was sufficient to have carried on the Revolutionary War continuously for more than a thousand years at the rate of expenditure which that war actually involved.

In addition to this huge expenditure loans were advanced to the Allies at the rate of nearly half a million dollars an hour. Congress authorized for this purpose $10,000,000,000, and there were actually paid to various Governments the sum of $8,850,000,000.

Of our war costs the Army was responsible for the expenditure of 64 per cent, or just short of two-thirds of the entire amount. Through April 30, 1919, there had been withdrawn from the Treasury on the Army account $14,244,061,000, an amount about equal to the value of all the gold produced in the whole world from the discovery of America to the outbreak of the European war. If there is deducted from this figure what would be the normal expenditure for a peace-time Army for a similar period there remains a total of $13,930,000,000 directly chargeable to the war.

The rate of expenditure for the Army and for the entire Government increased rapidly as the war progressed.

During the first three months war expenditures were at the rate of $2,000,000 per day. During the next year they averaged more than $22,000,000 a day. For the final 10 months of the period the daily total reached the enormous sum of $44,000,000. The immense daily average in the last period, most of which is in the months after the armistice, is surprising until we consider that the building of ships for the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the construction and operation of naval vessels, the food, clothing, pay, and land and ocean transportation of the Army have had to go forward at about the same rate as during the war. The great flow of munitions and supplies for the Army and Navy could not, out of regard for the industrial balance of the country, be stopped with too great abruptness. Numerous war-time activities and purchases had still to be paid for as well.

ARMY EXPENDITURES.

The following table shows the amounts expended by each important Army bureau. The Quartermaster Corps, which paid the soldiers and furnished them with food, clothing, equipment, and miscellaneous supplies, spent the most. The Ordnance Department was next in order, with over $4,000,000,000 for munitions, more than half of its expenditures being for artillery ammunition:

Expenditures by Army bureaus.

	Expended to Apr. 30, 1919.	Per cent.
Quartermaster Corps:
Pay of the Army, etc	$1,831,273,000	12.9
Other Quartermaster Corps appropriations	6,242,745,000	43.8
Ordnance Department	4,087,347,000	28.7
Air Service	859,291,000	6.0
Engineer Corps	638,974,000	4.5
Medical Department	314,544,000	2.2
Signal Corps	128,920,000	.9
Chemical Warfare Service	83,299,000	.6
Provost Marshal General	[1] 24,301,000	.17
Secretary's office and miscellaneous	[1] 33,367,000	.23
Total	14,244,061,000	100.00

[1] Figures are for Dec. 31, 1918. Expenditures since that date for these purposes have been small compared with other items in table.

The total of our Army expenditures shown in the table—$14,244,061,000—equals the value of all the gold produced in the entire world from the discovery of America up to the outbreak of the European war.

PERMANENT ASSETS.

As a result of the war efforts large quantities of munitions, supplies, and equipment have been secured which will be of value for many years to come. The Army now owns some of the finest docks in the world. The 16 National Army cantonments and 3 of the National Guard camps will be retained permanently as training camps. A number of first-class aviation fields and depots and balloon schools will be a permanent asset. We have stocks of most articles of clothing sufficient to last our Army for a number of years. There is also a large supply of standardized motor trucks.

As to rifles and machine guns and their ammunition, light and heavy artillery and ammunition, tanks and tractors, of these we have a supply of more than sufficient to equip fully an army of a million men and maintain them in active combat for six months. These munitions are of the best quality and of the latest design—Springfield and Enfield rifles, Browning machine guns and automatic rifles, field guns and howitzers of tried French design. Articles of miscellaneous equipment are available in like quantity and quality.

Thousands of Liberty motors and service planes are immediately available for any emergency. Engineer, signal, and medical equipment is on hand to the value of millions of dollars.

All these are lasting assets which we have as a result of war expenditures. They supply most valuable equipment for preparedness in the Military Establishment.

WAR EXPENDITURES OF ALL NATIONS.

The table below gives the figures showing the war expenditures of all nations up to May, 1919. It is as yet too soon to present figures that are entirely accurate, but these data have been carefully compiled and are believed to be substantially reliable.

Estimated total war expenditures of principal nations to Apr. 30, 1919.
[All figures in billions of dollars and excluding normal expenses and loans to Allies.]

Country:	Billions of dollars.
Great Britain and Dominions	38
France	26
United States	22
Russia	18
Italy	13
Belgium, Roumania, Portugal, Jugo-Slavonia	5
Japan and Greece	1
Total Allies and United States	123
Germany	39
Austria-Hungary	21
Turkey and Bulgaria	3
Total Teutonic allies	63
Grand total	186

The total direct war costs amount to about $186,000,000,000, and of this sum the enemy countries spent about one-third and those on the allied side about two-thirds. Germany spent more than any other nation, and was closely followed by Great Britain, whose expenditures include those of her colonies. The figure for France is $12,000,000,000 less than that for Great Britain, and our own figure is below that for France. The Austrian expenditure was almost equal to that of the United States. It is noteworthy that the United States spent about one-eighth of the entire cost of the war and something less than one-fifth of the expenditures on the allied side.

Mr. President, the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate diligently kept in touch with the activities of the War Department from the start to the finish of this greatest war, and I, a member of that committee, have seen these things come to pass.

The burden of the prosecution of the war rested primarily upon the War Department, and in striking contrast to the effective discharge of the great responsibility is the startling fact, as related in Upton's Military Policy of the United States (p. 233), of the action of another Secretary of War during the conduct of the Civil War. Upton says:

> So completely overwhelmed was the Secretary of War in providing arms and supplies for the 75,000 militia that the subject of organizing the volunteers and Regulars called out by the President's proclamation of May 3 was tossed over for solution to the Secretary of the Treasury. In the discharge of a military duty upon which depended the lives of hundreds of thousands of our citizens, if not the salvation of our cause, it was fortunate for the country that the Secretary was not left to the guidance of his limited experience. * * * Novel as were the duties imposed upon the Secretary of the Treasury, he and his assistants deserved the gratitude of the Nation, etc. They insured us against a series of disasters.

How vastly different was the conduct of our Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, in the preparation for and prosecution of this great war.

We have not changed this official, as some of the other nations had to do. We have had throughout this great enterprise but one Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker. A man of surpassing ability, strong of heart, and great of soul, who, with clear vision, saw the end from the beginning and with undaunted courage and unfaltering purpose, undisturbed by malicious criticism and abuse, established and pursued the policies in the discharge of the great responsibility that effected these tremendous results and brought glorious victory.

The deeds done, the things accomplished, proclaim him easily the greatest American Secretary of War, and if not certainly the superior, surely the peer of any like official in any war cabinet in the world.

The Chief of Staff, Gen. March, a mighty force, the grand factor, with consummate skill and matchless ability, organized, whipped into shape, and landed our Army overseas.

There, on the battle fields of France, under the command of our own peerless Gen. Pershing, the American Army, the terrible fighting machine, set the Stars and Stripes highest among the standards of the Nations and demonstrated in the face of the battling hosts of the world the incomparable qualities of the American soldier and the invincible prowess of the American Nation.

The Army conquered a peace that the war-weary world had despaired of, vindicated American rights, revived the love of liberty in the breast of mankind, and rekindled in the heart of the weak, subject, and oppressed peoples of the earth the hope of freedom and democracy.

PROCLAMATION AND STATEMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the President's proclamation to the American people on the high cost of living, and also his statement answering the railroad shopmen.

There being no objection, the proclamation and statement of the President were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION TO THE PEOPLE ON THE HIGH COST OF LIVING.

The President yesterday issued a statement addressed to the public, as follows:

"My fellow citizens, a situation has arisen in connection with the administration of the railways which is of such general significance that I think it my duty to make a public statement concerning it, in order that the whole country may know what is involved.

"The railroad shopmen have demanded a large increase in wages. They are now receiving 58, 63, and 68 cents per hour. They demand 85 cents per hour. This demand has been given careful and serious consideration by the board which was constituted by the Railroad Administration to adjust questions of wages, a board consisting of an equal number of representatives of employees and of the operating managers of the railroad companies. This board has been unable to come to an agreement, and it has therefore devolved upon the Director General of Railroads and myself to act upon the merits of the case.

"The shopmen urge that they are entitled to higher wages because of the higher wages for the present received by men doing similar work in shipyards, navy yards, and arsenals, as well as in a number of private industries, but I concur with the Director General in thinking that there is no real basis of comparison between the settled employment afforded mechanics by the railroads under living conditions as various as the location and surroundings of the railway shops themselves and the fluctuating employment afforded in industries exceptionally and temporarily stimulated by the war and located, almost without exception, in industrial centers, where the cost of living is highest.

"The substantial argument which the shopmen urge is the very serious increase in the cost of living. This is a very potent argument indeed. But the fact is that the cost of living has certainly reached its peak and will probably be lowered by the efforts which are now everywhere being concerted and carried out. It will certainly be lowered so soon as there are settled conditions of production and of commerce; that is, so soon as the treaty of peace is ratified and in operation and merchants, manufacturers, farmers, miners, all have a certain basis of calculation as to what their business will be and what the conditions will be under which it must be conducted. The demands of the shopmen, therefore, and all similar demands are in effect this: That we make increase in wages, which are likely to be permanent, in order to meet a temporary situation which will last nobody can certainly tell how long, but in all probability only for a limited time. Increase in wages will, moreover, certainly result in still further increasing the costs of production and, therefore, the cost of living, and we should only have to go through the same process again. Any substantial increase of wages in leading lines of industry at this time would utterly crush the general campaign which the Government is waging with energy, vigor, and substantial hope of success to reduce the high cost of living. And the increases in the cost of transportation which would necessarily result from increases in the wages of railway employees would more certainly and more immediately have that effect than any other enhanced wage costs. Only by keeping the cost of production on its present level, by increasing production, and by rigid economy and saving on the part of the people can we hope for large decreases in the burdensome cost of living which now weighs us down.

SPEAKS FOR GOVERNMENT AND PUBLIC.

"The Director General of Railroads and I have felt that a peculiar responsibility rests upon us, because in determining this question we are not studying the balance sheets of corporations, but in effect determining the burden of taxation which must fall upon the people of the country in general. We are acting not for private corporations, but in the name of the Government and the public, and must assess our responsibility accordingly. For it is neither wise nor feasible to take care of increases in the wages of railroad employees at this time by increase in freight rates. It is impossible at this time, until peace has come and normal conditions are restored, to estimate what the earning capacity of the railroads will be when ordinary conditions return. There is no certain basis, therefore, for calculating what the increases of freight rates should be, and it is necessary, for the time being at any rate, to take care of all increases in the wages of railway employees through appropriations from the Public Treasury.

"In such circumstances it seems clear to us, and I believe will seem clear to every thoughtful American, including the shopmen themselves when they have taken second thought, and to all wage earners of every kind, that we ought to postpone questions of this sort until normal conditions come again and we have the opportunity for certain calculations as to the relation between wages and the cost of living. It is the duty of every citizen of the country to insist upon a truce in such contest until intelligent settlements can be made and made by peaceful and effective common counsel. I appeal to my fellow citizens of every employment to cooperate in insisting upon and maintaining such a truce and to cooperate also in sustaining the Government in what I conceive to be the only course which conscientious public servants can pursue. Demands unwisely made and passionately insisted upon at this time menace the peace and prosperity of the country as nothing else could, and thus contribute to bring about the very results which such demands are intended to remedy.

SHOPMEN SHOULD GET 10 HOURS' PAY.

"There is, however, one claim made by the railway shopmen which ought to be met. They claim that they are not enjoying the same advantages that other railway employees are enjoying, because their wages are calculated upon a different basis. The wages of other railway employees are based upon the rule that they are to receive for eight hours' work the same pay they received for the longer workday that was the usual standard of the prewar period. The claim is, I am told, well founded; and I concur in the conclusion of the director general that the shopmen ought to be given the additional 4 cents an hour which the readjustment asked for will justify. There are certain other adjustments, also, pointed out in the report of the director general which ought in fairness to be made and which will be made.

"Let me add, also, that the position which the Government must in conscience take against general increases in wage levels while the present exceptional and temporary circumstances exist will, of course, not preclude the Railroad Administration from giving prompt and careful consideration to any claims that may be made by other classes of employees for readjustments believed to be proper to secure impartial treatment for all who work in the railway service.

"WOODROW WILSON.

"THE WHITE HOUSE,
"August 25, 1919."

PRESIDENT WILSON'S STATEMENT ANSWERING THE RAILROAD SHOPMEN.

The President in a statement to the representatives of the railroad shopmen yesterday said:

"Gentlemen, I request that you lay this critical matter before the men in a new light. The vote they have taken was upon the question whether they should insist upon the wage increase they were asking or consent to the submission of their claims to a new tribunal, to be constituted by new legislation. That question no longer has any life in it. Such legislation is not now in contemplation. I request that you ask the men to reconsider the whole matter in view of the following considerations, to which I ask their thoughtful attention as Americans, and which I hope that you will lay before them as I here state them.

"We are face to face with a situation which is more likely to affect the happiness and prosperity, and even the life, of our people than the war itself. We have now got to do nothing less than bring our industries and our labor of every kind back to a normal basis after the greatest upheaval known to history, and the winter just ahead of us may bring suffering infinitely greater than the war brought upon us if we blunder or fail in the process. An admirable spirit of self-sacrifice, of patriotic devotion, and of community action guided and inspired us while the fighting was on. We shall need all these now, and need them in a heightened degree, if we are to accomplish the first tasks of peace. They are more difficult than the tasks of war—more complex, less easily understood, and require more intelligence, patience, and sobriety. We mobilized our man power for the fighting; let us now mobilize our brain power and our consciences for the reconstruction. If we fail it will mean national disaster. The primary first step is to increase production and facilitate transportation, so as to make up for the destruction wrought by the war, the terrible scarcities it created, and so as soon as possible relieve our people of the cruel burden of high prices. The railways are at the center of this whole process.

GOVERNMENT WORKING TO REDUCE PRICES.

"The Government has taken up with all its energy the task of bringing the profiteer to book, making the stocks of necessaries in the country available at lowered prices, stimulating production and facilitating distribution, and very favorable results are already beginning to appear. There is reason to entertain the confident hope that substantial relief will result, and result in increasing measure. A general increase in the levels of wages would check and might defeat all this at its very beginning. Such increase would inevitably raise, not lower, the cost of living. Manufacturers and producers of every sort would have innumerable additional pretexts for increasing profits, and all efforts to discover and defeat profiteering would be hopelessly confused. I believe that the present efforts to reduce the costs of living will be successful if no new elements of difficulty are thrown in the way; and I confidently count upon the men engaged in the service of the railways to assist, not obstruct. It is much more in their interest to do this than to insist upon wage increases which will undo everything the Government attempts. They are good Americans along with the rest of us and may, I am sure, be counted on to see the point.

"It goes without saying that if our efforts to bring the cost of living down should fail after we have had time enough to establish either success or failure, it will, of course, be necessary to accept the higher costs of living as a permanent basis of adjustment, and railway wages should be readjusted along with the rest. All that I am now urging is that we should not be guilty of the inexcusable inconsistency of making general increases in wages on the assumption that the present cost of living will be permanent at the very time that we are trying with great confidence to reduce the cost of living and are able to say that it is actually beginning to fall.

UNCERTAINTY AS TO FUTURE OF RAILROADS.

"I am aware that railway employees have a sense of insecurity as to the future of the railroads and have many misgivings as to whether their interests will be properly safeguarded when the present form of Federal control has come to an end. No doubt it is in part this sense of uncertainty that prompts them to insist that their wage interests be adjusted now rather than under conditions which they can not certainly foresee. But I do not think that their uneasiness is well grounded. I anticipate that legislation dealing with the future of the railroads will be in explicit terms affording adequate protection for the interests of the employees of the roads; but quite apart from that it is clear that no legislation can make the railways other than what they are, a great public interest, and it is not likely that the President of the United States, whether in possession and control of the railroads or not, will lack opportunity or persuasive force to influence the decision of questions arising between the managers of the railroads and the railway employees. The employees may rest assured that, during my term of office, whether I am in actual possession of the railroads or not, I shall not fail to exert the full influence of the Executive to see that justice is done them.

"I believe, therefore, that they may be justified in the confidence that hearty cooperation with the Government now in its efforts to reduce the cost of living will by no means be prejudicial to their own interest, but will on the contrary prepare the way for more favorable and satisfactory relations in the future.

"I confidently count on their cooperation in this time of national test and crisis."

TRANSFER OF SHANTUNG TO JAPAN.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I shall avail myself of this lull in the proceedings with reference to the oil leasing bill and the lunch hour to discuss for a few moments the Shantung amendment. I shall ask not to be interrupted during the discussion because of my desire to boil down what I have to say in the shortest possible space. After I have completed my general statement I shall be open to any questions that may be propounded.

Mr. President, on last Saturday, three days ago, the Committee on Foreign Relations by a majority of one voted an amendment to articles 156, 157, and 158 of the treaty of peace with Germany, substituting the name "China" for the name "Japan" so that all the German leasehold rights in Shantung, and all German concessions and rights in Kiaochow Bay, obtained by that country in 1898 from China, and which by the said treaty Germany has renounced in favor of Japan, will by this amendment be transferred to China instead of Japan.

I do not believe and can not believe that this amendment will hold when the treaty reaches the Senate. I am satisfied that no greater blow could ever be struck against the real interests of China than by such an amendment.

Why did the majority of this committee pause in the midst of their hearings to make this particular amendment and then proceed with the usual leisure to lay out dates for further hearings which will consume a week or so more? The purpose is apparent. It is to signify to the country that the Senate is hostile to this treaty. It is to put Japan in a position where she can not without an appearance of being coerced do what she has promised to do. It is to create trouble between this country and Japan and thereby send the first dagger thrust into the body of this treaty. I can not but believe that the plan will fail because I know it ought to fail.

Is it an act of true friendship toward China or a mere political move to defeat the treaty? If its sponsors now fail to come forward and openly pledge that if Japan is driven out of this treaty then the United States will proceed single-handed and alone to drive Japan out of China, will renew this World War and send our soldiers into the Orient to fight for her, then by this act they are betraying China with a false kiss.

If, on the other hand, they declare they will make war to drive Japan out of China, to prevent Japan receiving only those rights which the other great nations of the world have received, then they are proclaiming a policy which they have assailed as being the most wicked part of the league of nations—a policy of interference with the quarrels of the Old World. Worse than that, while they violently condemn a joint agreement with the other great white nations of the world to shield the greater white races from annihilation they would send our sons to death to defend the inferior yellow races whom we claim to be so inferior as to be unfit to associate with us from a like self-destruction.

But, Mr. President, they know, and we know, that this country will never go to war against Japan to prevent Japan from doing just what we have allowed every other nation to do in China without a protest.

So, Mr. President, we are right up against this proposition, and the cleavage is clear and definite: Either we will bring both Japan and China into this league of nations, which, by the very terms of its provisions, will compel Japan to return to China all the German rights acquired by Japan, not only by conquest but by the solemn agreement made by her with China herself, or you will drive Japan out of this treaty, where she will not be bound by the obligations which she would assume by joining the league, and where she will be holding the German territory and all German interests by the right of conquest, and with the broken word of China she can work her way to the very limit of subjugation of all the Chinese territory not now within the sphere of influence of other powers.

With this league of nations China obtains an assurance which is tantamount to a guaranty by all the world that not only will Japan return to China what Germany wrested from her in 1898 but henceforth and so long as this league shall last no other nation shall rob China of one inch of her territory or exercise any control over her people inconsistent with the claim of complete independence and sovereignty.

I want to bring into the record and present to the American people in the briefest possible manner the principal facts upon which these definite declarations are founded and to recite them in their chronological order.

During the past 80 years all of the great European nations have, by the display of military force or other equally persuasive methods amounting to duress, secured from China commercial and railway concessions and rights and spheres of influence over large portions of Chinese territory and millions of Chinese people. During all this time the United States has never once protested against these concessions, but, on the other hand, has complimented the aggressors, only asking them to agree to the "open-door policy." These concessions have been obtained by Russia, Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, and other countries.

In 1898 Germany, finding in the murder of two German missionaries in China by bandits, who, by the way, murdered Chinese as well as these German missionaries, an excuse to satisfy her course, sent a naval expedition against China and under duress and threat of war somewhat more marked than that used by other nations secured from China a treaty. This treaty was entered into between Germany and China on March 6, 1898. What did Germany secure by this treaty? She secured (a) a 99-year lease on both sides of the entrance to the Bay of Kiaochow, Germany to construct fortifications at the entrance to the harbor; (b) certain territory on both the northern and southern sides of the entrance to the bay wherein Germany could exercise all administrative rights; (c) the island of Chiposan and Potato Island; (d) all islands lying seaward from Kiaochow Bay which may be of importance to its defense; (e) the right to construct two lines of railway in Shantung for commercial interests only.

Did Germany secure any right of sovereignty over China? She did not, because this treaty declared as follows: "His Majesty, the Emperor of China * * * while reserving to himself all rights of sovereignty over the leased territory, and so forth, enters into the agreement." It is but proper here to say that the sovereignty was in name only; that is, all administrative power was granted to Germany. Was there anything else bearing on this question of sovereignty? There was. When the United States approached Germany through diplomatic channels, to declare her purpose in Shantung, she answered not only that she did not claim any sovereignty over the leased territory, but also that she would not interfere with the "open-door policy," the policy of equal rights to all nations. And we replied, in effect, "All right, we are pleased to have this assurance."

To offset this German concession Great Britain sought like additional concessions at Weihiawei and China was rather glad to make this last concession because being a weak, defenseless nation her only hope to escape from political annihilation was to take advantage of the jealousies and rivalries of these great nations and to play one country against the other.

Then came the great World War. China could sever diplomatic relations with Germany and she could declare a war of Chinese words, but she could not fight Germany or any other country. Japan could fight, and the Allies needed all the help they could secure from Japan, and so it was agreed that Japan and not China should drive the Germans out of China. Japan undertook the job, and with no little cost in blood and treasure, for a poor country, she drove Germany out and took possession of whatever interest Germany had. But what was she to do with that which she had wrested from Germany? Nations generally have no object or an understanding when they make war, and she had her understanding with her allies. What was it? In substance it was this: "Whatever you take from Germany shall be yours; we shall not interpose any objections. Signed by France, Great Britain, Italy, and Japan." It ought to be remembered right here that Japan under this agreement with her allies was to receive, and did receive, no rights except those which were held by Germany under the treaty between Germany and China.

But Japan was not satisfied with the mere consent of these great powers, her allies alone. So on May 25, 1915, she secured a treaty from China herself, whereby China agreed that Japan should acquire the German leasehold rights and interests if Japan should take and hold them from Germany. Granted that China would have preferred to have the Germans ousted without substituting Japan for them. But she, with her 300,000,000 population, did not have the courage to attempt it. Japan with her 40,000,000 of people did have that courage. Granted that the agreement that Japan should be substituted for Germany was obtained by duress. So was every other concession in China of every other nation so obtained, because China did not dare resist. However, nothing was taken from China by Japan. What she took was from Germany, and she took it with the written consent of China.

All these concessions to all these nations are now past history, and there is no logical point where we can begin to differentiate between them. We can not and will not abrogate all of them. We can not and will not order all these nations out of China.

This, then, was the situation when the peace delegation met at Paris.

Of course, it would be a gracious act if Japan, who has paid all the cost in blood and treasure in wresting these interests from Germany, would turn everything back to China, but that must be done through the willingness of Japan and because Japan has bound herself to do so and not through any threat of ours.

By this amendment you make it almost impossible for Japan to comply with her own agreement with China without suffering humiliation and sacrificing the respect and natural pride of her people. By this amendment we, a third power, whom the opponents of the league insist should never interfere with the affairs of the Eastern Hemisphere, proceed to set aside a compact entered into between two nations of the Eastern Hemisphere in which we were in no way connected and performing this act with an arrogance no white nation would ever submit to so long as it had a drop of blood left to shed for its national honor. By this amendment you declare that Japan can not be trusted to keep sacred her word, given not only to China alone but also given to the United States and every other important nation by reiterated declarations. The act is not only grossly discourteous, but is the act of a big bully intent on either forcing war or compelling a disgraceful surrender.

I declare most emphatically, Mr. President, that if this treaty is signed by China and Japan and becomes a world compact, Japan must and will keep her word to return the German leasehold interests and concessions to China. She can not escape that obligation and will not escape it. Only the breach of her treaty with China, as you would break it by this amendment, and the forcing of Japan out of the league, as you would force her out of it by this amendment, would relieve her from this duty and virtually compel her, through the demand of her insulted people, to hold everything she has secured by conquest from Germany. Let us look at the unquestioned written obligation upon which this declaration is predicated. By this treaty between Japan and China, signed May 25, 1915, article 1 declares:

> The Chinese Government agrees to give full assent to all matters upon which the Japanese Government may hereafter agree with the German Government relating to the disposition of all rights, interests, and concessions which Germany by virtue of treaty or otherwise possesses in relation to the Province of Shantung.
> ART. 2. The Chinese Government agrees, as regards railways to be built by China herself from Chefoo to Lungkow, to connect with the Kiaochow-Tsinanfu Railway. If Germany abandons the privilege of financing the Kiweichsien line, China will permit Japanese capital to negotiate for the loan.
> ART. 3. The Chinese Government agrees, in the interest of trade and for the residences of foreigners, to open by China herself, as soon as possible, certain suitable places in the Province of Shantung as commercial ports.

Article 1 is the article by which China agrees to turn over to Japan the German concessions which I have mentioned. Article 2 transfers the right to build the railway mentioned to Japanese capitalists if the German capitalists decline to furnish the capital, and article 3 simply makes it incumbent upon China to open up additional ports for trade, to do exactly what other nations have compelled her to do and exactly what we compelled Japan herself to do more than half a century ago. There is certainly nothing unusual or grasping or unjust in the treaty itself.

But the treaty does not stand alone. It must be taken in connection with certain written notes and agreements which immediately preceded its execution and which are, therefore, a part of the treaty both as to any limitation or expansion.

It will be noted that the treaty itself makes no mention of any retransfer of the German rights to China. If there were nothing further than the bare treaty, the rights of Japan would eventually terminate with the expiration of the German lease on March 6, 1997.

Note, now, how incomparably more favorable than the German agreement is the Japanese agreement. Before China would sign this treaty she insisted that Japan should put in writing her oral agreements to return the German leasehold interests to China. And this is Japan's promise:

> Peking, May 25, 1915—
> Remember this was just before the treaty was signed and the consideration upon which China signed it—
>
> EXCELLENCY: In the name of my Government I have the honor to make the following declaration to the Chinese Government:
> When, after the termination of the present war, the leased territory of Kiaochow Bay is completely left to the free disposal of Japan, the Japanese Government will restore the said leased territory to China under the following conditions: * * *
> I avail, etc.
> (Signed) HIOKI EKI.

I will consider the "conditions" as submitted later. It has been often asserted that there is nothing fixing the time in which Japan will return this leasehold interest to China; that it means that she will do so when she gets good and ready, and that this means never.

Ah, Mr. President, let us see if that is the meaning. There is not a Senator who makes that declaration who would for one single moment admit that Japan could so misconstrue the agreement. I deny that the agreement is not specific as to time. It is just as specific as it was possible to make it at the time. Japan can not return to China that which she is to receive from Germany until Japan receives it from Germany under the treaty, and Japan can not receive it from Germany until the treaty is a binding obligation. In other words, the leased territory is not completely left to the free disposal of Japan until after the termination of this war. Japan then says to China, "When this war is terminated and I receive these rights under the treaty I will restore them to you." The word "when" as therein used means just exactly what you and I and what every nation would understand it to mean—that the process of turning the interests back to China and evacuating the territory by Japan must begin immediately after the termination of this war by the signing of the treaty. It is the same as if I agree that when I pay a debt which I owe you you shall give me a receipt for it. That means that you will give it immediately after I have made the payment. It means nothing else, and national honor and good faith would require Japan to begin this process of transferring and evacuating immediately after the signing of the treaty. That does not mean the very minute, or the very day, of the signing of the treaty, but it does mean with the readiness with which governments should act to fulfill treaty obligations.

On the same day and before the signing of the treaty the minister of foreign affairs of China acknowledged receipt of this letter, as follows:

MONSIEUR LE MINISTRE: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of this day's date in which you made the following declaration in the name of your Government:

"When, after the termination of the present war, the leased territory of Kiaochow Bay is completely left to the free disposal of Japan, the Japanese Government will restore the said leased territory to China under the following conditions."

I avail, etc.,

LOU TSENG-TSIANG.

As stated before, I am considering now only the promise and the time it is to be effectuated. By this exchange of notes, both coming before the signing of the treaty and in effect parts of the treaty, the minds of the two nations met as to a time when Japan is to fulfill her obligation to return the property, namely, immediately after the termination of the present war by the signing of the treaty. The agreement, standing alone, is sufficient to force irrevocably upon Japan this obligation to return the German leasehold interests and all these German rights to China without equivocation or needless delay.

Those who would fire the brand of race prejudice into the flame of war can only meet this clear treaty promise with the declaration: "Japan is lying; she will not keep her treaty; therefore we won't even give her a chance to keep it, but for fear that she might possibly keep her treaty obligations we will put her in such a position that she can not honorably keep them without indicating to the world that we—the United States—forced her to do so, and then we can use her refusal as an argument on the futility of the league of nations." Has Japan ever signified that she would not keep this treaty? Never. On the other hand, has she not declared officially, again and again, that she did purpose to keep it in its letter and spirit?

On January 21, 1919, Viscount Uchida, Japanese minister of foreign affairs, stated positively that Kiaochow would be returned to China in accordance with the terms of the agreement of May 25, 1915. Later, in May, 1919, the preceding foreign minister of Japan, Baron S. Goto, made the same declaration as to the purpose of Japan. Baron Kimmochi Saionji, a Japanese statesman, in an interview published in the Outlook in 1919, said: "Japan has solemnly promised to give back the leased territory of Kiaochow and to restore Shantung to China in full sovereignty, except a little land at Tsingtau for establishing a Japanese settlement, and Japan will keep her word." Mr. Debuchi, chargé d'affaires, stated: "Japan, if not within a period of six months, will be able perhaps in a year to comply with the treaty provisions with China and restore Kiaochow and all heretofore German-controlled territory in Shantung to China." Practically the same statements have been reiterated by the Japanese foreign office, all declaring positively that Japan will make good her promise. It is our clear duty under those conditions to refrain from such act of hostility and enmity and disregard for national pride or sentiment as this amendment would mean.

Is there any other assurance that Japan will keep her word? Yes; there is a world assurance. What is it? The league of nations provision of the treaty, the very foundation principles upon which the entire structure rests. The preamble of this league, reciting the fundamental methods by which international cooperation is to be promoted and international peace and security to be achieved, declares that these great ends are to be secured, first, "by the prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations," and second, "by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized people with one another." Just remember right here that the league must enforce a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations.

To-day Japan stands pledged to China, if China keeps her word and if this country does not by this proposed amendment make China break her word, to return the German Shantung and Kiaochow privileges to China. If Japan signs this treaty she makes the further pledge to all the great nations of the world that she will keep her treaty with China. She not only makes this double pledge, but in addition she places herself in a position where the great powers are not only authorized to compel her to keep her obligation, but they are in duty bound to compel her to make good. In Heaven's name, what more could be asked?

What would be China's means of redress under the league if Japan should fail to keep her agreement with China? China would say to the council of the league of nations: "Japan has agreed by treaty with us that when the war was terminated and she was free to make disposal of the German rights, she would return those rights to us. The war has now terminated, Japan is now free to make the disposal, and Japan is refusing or neglecting, as the case may be, to return them. Japan is therefore breaking her treaty with us, and in addition is breaking her solemn obligation to the league of nations. This action on the part of Japan will lead to war, and we call upon the league to require Japan to perform her sacred promise."

The league machinery, Mr. President, must then be put into operation upon the complaint of China. This will require Japan to answer as to her treaty promise, and as that promise is clear and unequivocal, as there can not be a possible disagreement as to the true meaning and intent of the promise, clear in its context and definite in Japanese official declarations, the very presentation of the matter would find its settlement through diplomacy. The chances are a thousand to one that it would go no further. But if Japan should be so foolish as to defy the whole world, of course the means provided to coerce a recalcitrant member of the league would be adopted. But, Mr. President, Japan would not defy all the great nations of the world, and in that certainty, and in the certainty that the same principle of "hands off" would be applied to any other would-be aggressor, is China's only assurance for future security not only as against Japan but as against every other nation.

I would, therefore, say to China: "Keep your word with Japan just as you kept it with Germany, just as you have kept it with all other nations who have secured from you commercial and political rights, and trust your case to a league of all the nations of the world by whose solemn compact your treaty rights are assured and your territorial rights are protected."

I come now to the conditions mentioned in the exchange of notes between China and Japan under which the German rights and privileges are to be returned to China.

Let us see if there is anything in those conditions that either we or China can justly complain of. The first condition reads:

(1) The whole of Kiaochow Bay is to be opened as a commercial port.

Is there anything wrong or unconscionable in that? Under the German treaty that port was to be guarded by German cannon and defended by German warships. If the world had any commercial rights it was because Germany designed to grant those rights. China had nothing to say concerning it.

Under the Japanese-Chinese agreement the whole bay is to be opened by China as a commercial port for the free commerce of all nations. Japan retains no special concessions therein.

Is that not exactly what China has done with respect to many other ports at the solicitation or pressure of other powers? Is that not just what the United States did when she compelled Japan to open up her ports to the commerce of the world? We have sought commercial trade in the Orient just as earnestly as other countries and we have done our part in exerting pressure to secure the opening of commercial ports in the Orient. Is there any wrong now in adding one more neutral port to the commerce of the world? The second condition reads:

(2) A concession under the exclusive jurisdiction of Japan to be established at a place designated by the Japanese Government.

What does this mean? It means, Mr. President, just what it has meant when the same character of grant, or concession, as it is called, has been given to every other great power, a small tract where the nationals of the grantee can reside, hold their property, and engage in commerce under the administrative control of the grantee. This concession is described by Marquis Kimmochi Saionji as—a little land at Tsingtau for establishing a Japanese settlement—or more fully described by Mr. Debuchi when he said:

In regard to the establishment of a Japanese settlement we ask nothing that is not granted by China to all other nationals. The word settlement may be misunderstood; in fact, it means nothing more than the setting aside of a certain section for the homes of the Japanese nationals and for foreign nationals, such, for instance, as is held by the French in Shanghai.

Every other European nation has one or more of these special settlement concessions, and I think we accepted one some years back, but am not certain.

Now, why should we deny Japan this right to have a tract of land under her control for the residences of her nationals when the same rights are exercised by other powers? Upon what theory can we deny that equal right to Japan?

(3) If the foreign powers desire it, an international concession may be established.

That means, I presume, a place where the nationals of all foreign nations may live in the same settlement, but that is dependent not upon Japan but upon the powers interested. I do not see that it is of any material importance in the face of the many special settlements granted. The fourth condition relates simply to disposal of German public establishments and property. The arrangement for their disposal must be made between Japan and China as a collateral agreement. The properties covered are of such little value that if China and Japan could not easily arrive at a conclusion, China, without any material loss, could say to Japan: "Take the property and do with it as you like."

Mr. President, I have no quarrel with or criticism of those who are opposed to the league of nations as to the methods they may employ to bring about its demise. Their purpose is death, and they are pursuing what they believe to be the surest way to effectuate that purpose. If controlled by overpowering prejudices, they are willing to take the chance of another such awful catastrophe upon the plains of Europe, the land of our fathers and the home of our kinsmen, rather than have us join the European powers to prevent it, or if, guided by their reason, they really believe we are surrendering anything we ought not to surrender for such a purpose, they may find a satisfactory reason for playing the rôle of Brutus driving the shining blade into the heart of Cæsar, not that they love world peace less but because they love American freedom of action more.

But, Mr. President, as one who does believe in the league of nations to maintain the peace of the world, and who does believe that there is not a single sovereign power surrendered or a single right withheld that ought not to be withheld for such a blessed purpose, I regard it as my duty to do all in my power by word and by vote to prevent the commission of the homicidal purpose of this amendment.

I know, Mr. President, they declare that this wound will not be fatal, but, Mr. President, the dagger is poisoned; and if the poison operates as they expect it to operate, it does mean death to the treaty.

Mr. President, there is but one honorable, upright, and proper course to be pursued by all the great nations of the world, including China and Japan. Let China keep her treaty; give Japan an opportunity to do what she has pledged her national honor to do; cease this attempt to juggle this country into war with Japan; defeat this proposed amendment which arrogates to ourselves the right to annul a treaty between China and Japan and sets at naught a treaty made during the stress of battle between our cobelligerents and Japan before we entered into the war; bring Japan and China into this world league, and as sure as the sun shall rise to-morrow Japan will keep her plighted faith, and China will receive complete present justice and assured future protection. On the other hand, force this breach of contract by China; drive Japan out of this league by insulting her honor; relieve her from her treaty by first breaking it yourselves, and thereby installing her in her impregnable position of right of conquest, and China is doomed. The other European nations can not help her, because they are tied by their own treaties, and we will not make war on Japan to help China after she has broken her treaty, because America will not go to war 10,000 miles away to help China to break her treaty.

Mr. President, if these be the only friends of China, then God save China from her friends.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator has concluded, I should like to ask him a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before that is done, Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary may read a letter which I received yesterday from Mr. Talcott Williams. I believe Mr. Talcott Williams is connected with the League to Enforce Peace, and therefore you may take this letter with just such credence as you see fit; but it reaches the point so deftly and so skillfully that I ask the Secretary to read it as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the communication.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON BUREAU, LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE,
August 25, 1919.

Senator P. J. McCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR McCUMBER: Your brief but penetrating and illuminating statement on the Shantung question which appeared this morning is to my knowledge the first public utterance in this country recognizing that both the rights and wrongs of China in the Province of Shantung are but part of a long series of acts by other powers encroaching on the sovereignty of China, and endeavoring to control the economic development of China for the aggrandisement of foreign powers and the undue profit of foreign capital. The only difference between the situation of China now and in the past is not that her rights are threatened, they have been for nigh a century, but that now, for the first time, she has a remedy near at hand.

The covenant and treaty give China the only chance its vast population has had since European penetration began to escape from exploitation by appealing to an international tribunal with an organization of nations to execute its decisions.

Shantung is now in the temporary possession of Japan by conquest. In the absence of any covenant between nations, creating a new order, there are only two ways to give Shantung to China. One is by the free gift of Japan. This Japan has already pledged. Every threat, every attack on Japan, the change now proposed in a treaty drawn under the express pledge of Japan to turn Shantung over to China makes the surrender less likely. The amendment conveying directly to China territory conquered by Japan and in her hands would be enough pretext, as many diplomatic precedents show, to lead Japan to keep the territory.

If Japan should, does anyone propose to go to war with Japan? Does anyone in the Senate and in the country want to go to war with Japan over Shantung? Does anyone want more war?

If war is out of the question, only two courses are open, to let the evils of the past go on or to create a new league of nations which can require Japan to keep its pledge to surrender all the territory taken in war to China. As to the "economic interests" which Japan retains in Shantung, these must go. How? By war?

Will any American ask this country to go to war over Japan's "economic interests" in Shantung? If war can not be here, too, the only way to deal with these "economic interests" is for China to prove that these grants are unjust before an international tribunal. The covenant gives a right to do this. Reject the covenant, amend the treaty, open all these questions, and nothing can be done, if Japan refuses, except by war. Hold Japan to the pledge, establish the new order, and China has the first chance in 80 years to secure justice.

Through all those years China has been plundered by treaty. Her tariff was enacted by treaty, all to the economic disadvantage of China, and enforced by arms. Her customs were put under foreign control. Her coast was patrolled by a foreign revenue service. Her forts have been seized and are still held by foreign powers. Every country has shared and been a party to these international iniquities. They must cease. The covenant and treaty establish the means. The 300,000,000 of China have a right to a peaceful remedy for the economic wrongs of 80 years and this can only be secured by ratifying this treaty with all that it holds, putting Japan up to its pledge and giving China its day in court, to seek redress for the economic thraldom that now exists.

* * * * * * *

I am for this treaty because it gives China and every land, prone to peace and not to war, its place in the sun of international justice. This I prefer to the fires of war.

I have the honor to be,
Very respectfully, yours,

TALCOTT WILLIAMS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. NELSON. I delayed asking the question because the Senator from North Dakota preferred not to be interrupted in his speech. My question is this: The treaty of peace now before the Senate has been ratified by Germany and by England. Assuming that that treaty will be ratified by Italy and France, by its terms it will then become effective as a valid treaty?

Mr. McCUMBER. Between those nations.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; between those nations. Will the Senator inform me if the treaty that is now in the hands of the Committee on Foreign Relations with the amendment in respect to China and Japan, that has lately been injected into the treaty, is adopted, what will be the effect of the treaty upon the other treaty that has been ratified by Germany, England, France, Italy, and Japan? Will it destroy it, will it neutralize it, or what will be the effect of it? There are many great constitutional lawyers upon the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I should like to have their views upon whether the treaty with the Chinese amendment will destroy and neutralize the other treaty after it has been ratified in the manner I have indicated.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is a big difference between Germany granting certain rights to Japan and Germany granting certain rights to China; in other words, as the treaty would say, in Germany renouncing all her interests in China to Japan and Germany renouncing all her interests in China to China. That changes the treaty; it changes conditions; it is not the same treaty. It goes back, and therefore it would have to be reconsidered by all the powers.

Mr. NELSON rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Possibly I did not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, I think he did not comprehend my question, for he does not answer it.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I do not answer it, it is because I do not understand it.

Mr. NELSON. I am asking the Senator not as to what has to be done, but assuming the things that I have stated, assuming that the treaty as ratified by England and Germany will be ratified by France, Italy, and Japan, and assuming that by the terms of the treaty it will be valid as between them, what effect will our treaty have with the Chinese amendment in it? Will it neutralize or destroy the other treaty or will it override it and be paramount?

Mr. McCUMBER. The question answers itself. It is a different treaty. It is in conflict with the other treaty. Therefore there are ostensibly two treaties and we have not a treaty of peace agreed to by all the nations.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Suppose the nations that have ratified the other treaty in the manner I have indicated will not acquiesce in our treaty. What will we in this country do with our treaty with the Chinese amendment in it, assuming that we ratify it in that form?

Mr. McCUMBER. We will do nothing.

Mr. NELSON. It would be then like the Pope's bull against the comet? Is that the opinion of the Senator?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have answered the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator, the treaty in its present form having been ratified by Japan, England, and France, whether Germany's rights in the lease of Shantung do not then pass to Japan?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. And the amendment of the treaty would not affect the cession of those rights?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; it would not affect it as between the powers that have not agreed to it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, when it was known that Shantung had been given to Japan, or that such economic rigths and privileges had been granted to Japan as would enable her to control Shantung, there was no one found anywhere to defend the act. Even the makers of the treaty did not defend these particular provisions of the treaty. No member of the peace delegation at Paris has ever defended it upon the basis of right and justice. They have contented themselves with saying that it was the only thing that could be done in order to secure Japan's signature to the league of nations or to the treaty. No other defense than that of barter and trade in the rights of a friendly nation has ever been advanced by those who helped to write these provisions in the treaty. All members of the peace delegation, so far as we are now advised, were opposed to the settlement. Three members of the delegation wrote a protest against it, or, if those who are meticulous about the term prefer, I will say they wrote an argument against it. The President himself has been very prompt in saying that it was unsatisfactory to him. I take it, therefore, that there was something in the situation and in the facts that led the representatives of America to the belief that this was an unjust, unfair, and immoral settlement, and it was undoubtedly so regarded. That is the way some of us still regard it.

Those who recall the President's message upon his return to this country will remember the particular paragraph in which he said in substance there were some things impossible of settlement in accordance with his views or with the views of justice and correct principles. He stated further there were conditions found which could not be changed. I do not quote his exact language; I express his sentiment.

So to-day we hear the first defense that we have had of the Shantung affair upon the ground of justice and morality. It is the first defense which has been made upon the theory that it was the only correct, wise, and just thing to do.

I am going to make some observations upon it, and what I have to say shall be based almost entirely upon documents the existence of which can not be disputed and the import of which is beyond doubt or controversy——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. And also upon the statements of those who are now criticizing the proposed amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. As the Senator is discussing the Shantung proposition, I wish to ask him a question. Suppose we put it in the treaty that China is given the rights that Germany formerly owned in China and it is agreed to by the other nations except Japan. What method does the Senator suggest by which we can enforce an agreement like that?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho is not seeking for any method by which to enforce the treaty. The Senator from Idaho is desirous of relieving the United States as a Government from the burden or obligation of undertaking to maintain that which he conceives to be founded in immorality. I would wish, of course, that the question had never come to us at all. I would have preferred that China and Japan settle their affairs. But it is here by no wish of the Senate, by no wish of the American peace delegates, and solely at the instance of Japan. Japan forced it in the treaty. Being here, I know of no way of settling it but in accordance with right and justice. I have no fear if it is thus settled but the United States will escape without trouble. It is the immoral and unjust treaties which make for war, not those founded in right.

If we make the treaty and Japan refuses to accede to it, the treaty will fail and a new treaty will have to be written. There is just one principle that guides me in this treaty transaction from beginning to end, and that is to protect the United States. I want to vote so as to put her in an honorable position.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit another interruption, the practical question which occurs to me is this: Japan has taken over by force of arms this Province formerly belonging to Germany, and if we undertake to give it by treaty to China, Japan, being in possession of it, will simply tell us to go to, and we will have to go to war to carry it out.

Mr. BORAH. No; we will not have to go to war. If Japan does not accede to it, we have relieved ourselves of what I consider to be an immoral thing in undertaking to give it to Japan instead of China. Our record will be clean, and we have no reason to go further than to do that. If Japan agrees to this amendment, the matter will be settled. If she refuses to agree, then no treaty is made and we will be in a position to make a separate treaty of peace with Germany and step out of all these vicious and dishonorable and wholly immoral entanglements—a thing devoutly to be wished on my part.

Mr. President, I was calling attention to the fact that at the time this transaction happened it was universally condemned. It was regarded at best as a thing imposed upon the American delegation by the law of necessity. I can understand how the President might be willing to indorse the Shantung affair because of the fact that he regarded a greater thing to be accomplished in the signature of Japan to the treaty and the league of nations. Viewing the league of nations as he does, looking upon it as he does, I can well understand how the President would regard it necessary to do what he undoubtedly thought was an improper thing in order to accomplish a greater and ultimately a better thing. But neither the President nor anyone else except the able Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has until this time undertaken to justify it upon any ground other than expediency, an expediency which was based upon concededly unjust and immoral principles.

I call attention to editorials of newspapers some of which are now criticizing the action of the committee. All these papers were in condemnation in terms more severe. I shall quote from papers only which have been and are supporters of the league.

The New York Times, speaking of both Fiume and the Shantung affair, says:

> Neither the one decision nor the other squares with the doctrines of international morals upon which the league of nations is founded; both are at variance with the principles of the 14 points drawn up by President Wilson.

Further on it says:

> Japan's insistence upon full recognition of the rights she assumes to have gained in the Province of Shantung by her capture of Kiaochow from Germany and by her treaty of 1915 with China was a much more serious matter.

That is, more serious than the Italian affair.

> The Chinese saw, all the world saw, that it meant putting China under bondage to Japan. The 99-year lease of Kiaochow was doubly vitiated. It was originally extorted from China under duress by Germany in 1898 as a form of compensation for the murder of two missionaries. But the declaration of war by China had the natural effect of terminating that engagement.

That was the position generally taken at that time. The argument that Germany had something to cede at Versailles is based upon a misconception of the facts. Germany had nothing after China declared war upon Germany, because all rights under the leasehold were void from that time. This paper, most friendly to the President, and an able and ardent supporter of the league, further says:

> Before the peace conference, therefore, the Japanese rested their claims upon a title already void. But Kiaochow represents only a small part of their interest and their ambition. Control of the railroad from Tsingtau to Tsinan puts Japan in a position to command lines of interior communication vital to the industrial development of China, while other provisions of the treaty of 1915 accord to her rights and privileges altogether inconsistent with Chinese sovereignty, and of these China has with force and justice complained to the conference.

Commenting upon the fact that the Versailles conference had met a situation with which it had to deal, and necessarily some compromises had to be made, the New York Times says:

> Mr. John Morley, now Viscount Morley, in his book On Compromise, quotes this unyielding precept from Archbishop Whately: "It makes all the difference in the world whether we put truth in the first place or in the second place." Truth goes to the second place by the decisions of the peace conference in respect to the demands of Italy and of Japan.

And this stern and trenchant editorial closes with this language:

> Four hundred million Chinamen can not be sacrificed to the ambition of Japan. That would put truth not merely in the second place but on the scaffold.

That undoubtedly represented the view of this country at the time the first information came to us with reference to this transaction; that undoubtedly represented the moral conviction of the people of this country that the United States could not afford to be a party to it. While it was not the business of the United States to travel about over the earth and adjust treaties which had been made or to undertake to reconcile conflicting interests among foreign nations, it was believed that the United States could not afford to indorse and confirm, and then, under the league of nations, pledge itself to underwrite and maintain, such a transaction as that of Shantung.

I quote a single paragraph from an article in the Christian Science Monitor, whose editorial page we all recognize as one of the ablest in this country. Not always agreeing with it, we nevertheless recognize both conviction and ability behind its editorials and expressions of opinion upon public questions:

Perhaps the worst feature of the Shantung betrayal is the destruction of faith, caused by it, in the justice of the decisions of the peace council. When a step has been taken manifestly so politically immoral, the ordinary man is apt to ask, "What next?" And the cynic to murmur sardonically, "I told you so." Every thoughtful person knew, of course, that the real troubles of the Allies would come with the attempt to make peace, but few, it is to be imagined, believed that the sentiments fanned to keep the war flame buring would be snuffed out so unceremoniously on the peace table. In the light, however, of what has occurred the veriest Chinese rice hoer might be forgiven for quoting an epigram from that quaint and delightful teacher, Lao Tzu, to the effect that the shamelessness of those who preach duty to their neighbors is ordinarily shameless indeed: "Alas, they know not shame, nor what it is to blush!"

In closing, the edtorial says:

Unfortunately, Shantung is not a matter of opinion; it is a moral failure; and now the world is afraid of a repetition of Shantung in Armenia. Fiume, the Saar Valley, Danzig, all these may leave room for differences of opinion; but Shantung? No! The moral sense of the world has been outraged in Shantung, and sometimes the weary Titan wakes up and remembers that he has a moral sense.

I might quote many other papers. I might quote from public men, from ministers of the gospel, but why offer proof of what all recognize to be a fact, that the whole scheme was thought to be indefensible from the standpoint of right, intolerable from the standpoint of our national honor? What has changed? The terms of the treaty are the same, the facts are the same. It is now, as it was then, a clear-cut moral issue. Shall the United States do a wrong to a friendly power? Shall this Republic bow to the dictation of an immoral exigency?

As I said a moment ago to those who believe that henceforth and forevermore the league of nations will establish peace upon the earth, there is argument in favor of the proposition that even this sacrifice must be made. But before you conclude that it is safe to found a league upon immorality and wrong let me call your attention to some fundamental principles which the President stated before he went to France. I believe some of these principles to be an epitomization of the teaching of 300 years of history; that there can be no such thing as peace founded upon immorality and injustice. You can not write a league of nations nor form treaties nor enter into international engagements so strong but these acts of immorality and injustice will break and destroy them. Instead of bringing peace, they always have and always will produce war.

The President said:

We have used great words, all of us have used the great words "right" and "justice," and now we are to prove whether or not we understand these words and how they are to be applied to the particular settlements which must conclude this war. And we must not only understand it but we must have the courage to act upon the understanding.

Above all things necessary in this supreme hour, when we are laying the foundation for world peace, is to have the courage to act upon that understanding, not simply because China is wronged or Japan has an undue advantage, but because those are essential and indispensable principles upon which to build peace. Without them your league is a mockery. Without them you can not hope for peace whatever be the terms of the league. If there is one thing which has been better demonstrated than another through the 300 years of warfare, it is that every war had its seeds planted in the years before through some act of injustice or oppression toward some other nation. We are only repeating the folly, yes, the crime, of past days. We are doing vicious things and calling them just.

What was the real cause of war in 1914? Was it because a satellite of royalty was murdered at Sarajevo in Bosnia? Possibly that was the match that ignited the powder mine, but for 150 or 200 years just such things as the things written in sections 56, 57, and 58 of this treaty had been done, the poison had spread throughout States and Empires. The great wrong to Poland threw its shadow far into the future and had to do with the conditions of 1914. Have we not been told time and time again that Alsace-Lorraine was the one cancer which was eating away the moral fiber of Europe, and that until that wrong was righted no peace could prevail in Europe? One wrong, one injustice, after another until the whole of Europe was satiated with discontent and suspicion and jealousy and hate—until rulers thought, as we now seem to think, that you can do wrong with impunity. The hour of reckoning came.

Nevertheless, while we are pledging the people of the world that we are building a scheme for universal peace, we are putting into the very heart of the covenant, into the league itself, a scheme infinitely worse than either Alsace-Lorraine or Poland. Poland was dismembered and divided by antagonistic nations. Alsace-Lorraine was the fruit of war, and a brutal and powerful enemy saw fit to take it away. But Shantung is taken from an ally, from a friendly nation, a people who did their part, and over the pledge of one of those engaged in the war with her to protect her rights.

Again, the President says:

Self-determination is not a mere phrase but an imperative principle of action, which statesmen will henceforth ignore at their peril.

Yes, Mr. President; "at their peril." Within a fortnight after the Shantung matter was known, all China, 400,000,000 strong, was aroused as never before. The young men, the students of China, scattered throughout that vast region, bestirred themselves and began to organize in groups of tens and twenties until to-day, notwithstanding the censored press, we know that China, with her 400,000,000, is a seething mass of discontent and bitterness. Nearly one-third of the population of the earth aroused and determined to resist in every way she can this scheme for world peace.

Yes; we ignore that principle "at our peril." That is a statement not born of fancy, as some might believe, but a great truth gathered from the study of history and from knowledge of human nature. The President knows, you know, and I know that you can not violate the laws of nationality, that you can not trample upon the rights of peoples, except at your peril.

Mr. President, the able Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] presents two propositions, which are the main theme of his very able and ingenious argument—first, that Japan can be relied upon to keep her word and return these rights to China, and, second, that she has in fact promised to return these rights.

I pass over for the moment the first proposition. It is a delicate question to discuss, and yet I do not know of any way of dealing with this situation except to discuss the facts. But I pass it over for the moment and call the Senator's attention to the fact that nowhere has Japan ever promised to return anything except a mere shell. You will not find, Mr. President, where Japan has promised to return the economic rights which enable her absolutely to dominate not merely the city, not merely the port, but the entire Province of Shantung, with its 38,000,000 to 40,000,000 people. At the present time she is operating a railroad from the port to the capital; she is at the present time working the mines of Shantung; she is at the present time distributing her people throughout Shantung, and she will be enabled to keep them there if she retains the economic rights. So I say that Japan might very well comply technically with the promise which she has made, and I would be perfectly willing for the sake of the argument to admit that she will comply with it; but after she has complied with it she is still the complete master of Shantung.

Senators will remember the difference of opinion between the President and Uchida. The first statement made on the part of Japan by its representative was so far wide of the facts that the President of the United States felt under the necessity of immediately correcting it. Uchida said that we agreed at Paris to conform with the terms of the 1915 agreement or treaty. The President said the 1915 agreement had nothing to do with it. Already before the ink is dry upon the parchment, before the treaty has been ratified, there is a difference of opinion upon a most substantial and material matter between the President and the representative of Japan.

It is not an immaterial matter about which they differ. If it had been, the President undoubtedly would have given no consideration to it. It was a substantial matter and changed the entire theory upon which the restoration was to take place.

Under the statement made by Uchida the return could take place and yet Japan dominate Shantung; but the President did not so understand. If that misunderstanding already obtains, what shall we expect in a year or two years or three years or five years hence, when possibly the President shall have passed out of office and when possibly the men who are in Japan now seeking to interpret it shall have passed out of office?

The Senator from North Dakota must not forget that it has been stated in the assembly of Japan by no less an authority than the speaker of that body that Japan is under no obligation to return anything to China and does not intend to do so. Suppose in five years from now the speaker of the assembly of Japan should be its foreign minister. What construction would be placed upon this obligation to return? He is not the only one who has made that statement. If the Senator cares to familiarize himself with the public press of Japan, he will find that a very large majority of that press, as it comes to this country at least, says that there is nothing to return to China.

The expert whom the President chose to go to Paris to advise upon Far Eastern matters, Mr. E. T. Williams, states this better than I can state it, and of course with more knowledge than I can possibly possess. I read a paragraph from his statement:

Japan's promise to restore is based upon the famous 1915 convention which China, at the threat of war by Japan, was compelled to sign. This convention provides that when Japan obtains full title to the Kiaochow territory, she would restore the territory to China under four conditions. There is no doubt—but that Japan will keep her promise, but one of these conditions makes this promise void of any real meaning. That condition was that Japan should be granted a concession of land in the leased territory to be selected by herself for a Japanese settlement, which was to be under the exclusive jurisdiction of Japan.

Remember, Japan is to select the location of the concession; there is no limit upon the territory which it is to cover, and, according to construction of concessions in oriental countries, they are either absolute or, what is the same thing, leases in perpetuity. So Japan under the 1915 treaty can select a concession which would cover all of the territory in that particular port which would be of any value to anyone at all.

The Senator says it is to be a small piece of ground. It would not have to be very large in order that Japan might control the railway terminals, the port, and the entire situation so far as economical affairs are concerned; but it will be large enough to enable Japan to accomplish what I shall undertake to show in a few moments she has been intending to accomplish for years.

The effect of this condition is to permit Japan simply to give up a lease which has 78 years to run, in return for which she gets a perpetual lease to whatever portion of the leased territory she desires for her own exclusive possession. Japan can fully keep her "promises" and yet return to China nothing more than a bathing beach and worthless islands in the bay. To understand this requires knowledge of the original lease forced by Germany from China.

This expert, the chosen counselor and adviser of the President at Versailles, continues his statement:

ORIGINAL LEASE.

This original lease to Germany covered the waters of Kiaochow Bay to high-water mark, two or three small islands in the bay of no consequence, and two pieces of territory, one on either side of the entrance to the bay. That on the left of the entrance is quite small and is of value only as a bathing beach; that on the right is larger and has become the site of the town of Tsingtau. There are located the wharves, docks, barracks, railroad terminals, and important public buildings.

If Japan selects a site for her own settlement within the leased territory, she must select it within one or the other of these two pieces of ground. That she will not locate it on the bathing beach is certain. Since it is to be selected by herself, it is inconceivable that she would select any other than a site within the present town of Tsingtau. That this is intended is beyond all question, for during the past four years the Japanese have been buying all important sites at Tsingtau and have expropriated against the wishes of Chinese peasants a strip of territory across the peninsula behind the town of Tsingtau. Moreover, the phraseology used in the clause of the peace treaty itself confirms this deduction, for it provides for the transfer of the wharves, docks, barracks, and other public property by Germany at Tsingtau, free of all charges to Japan.

Therefore, if Japan returns all she has agreed to return she has in fact returned nothing to China of any moment to her so far as the Shantung Province is concerned. When you take into consideration that Japan now, under the conditions which obtain at this time and while the dispute is on with reference to her rights, is controlling Shantung in its entirety, you can well imagine what will be the result after Japan has for a few months or a few years increased and amplified her rights, as she will be able to do, under this concession. The fact is she is now in control to all practical purposes of the entire Province. She is exploiting its great natural wealth and placing her people throughout the Province.

Mr. President, as I stated a moment ago, the next subject which I desire to discuss is rather a delicate and difficult one to present. It is one which I would have no desire to present if it were not necessary, as I view it, from the course which the argument has taken. It is the proposal before us which justifies a frank discussion of all the facts. Things which under our traditional foreign policy would be of little concern under the proposed program become of the utmost concern. Discussions which could not under the old policy of our Government be justified are now rendered necessary. When I am asked as a Senator to vote to join this Government with the Government of Japan I must be permitted, without intentional offense to Japan, to discuss facts. I refuse to be silent when silence may lead to the wrong decision upon the part of the American people concerning a matter of the highest moment to them. I certainly have no desire to incur the ill will or enmity of any nation or people. But I state frankly that with me it is America first. We should certainly like to live in friendship and cordiality with all people, and we shall never intentionally offend any nation or people. But the plain, undisputed facts must be stated in order that we may form an intelligent opinion relative to our supreme duty in this supreme crisis of our history.

The Senator from North Dakota says there can be no doubt about Japan's good intentions in keeping her promises and her treaty engagements. The attitude of Japan toward China is a duplication of her history with reference to Korea. The two transactions are so nearly alike in detail and in general principles that it would seem success in the former has inspired the latter. The policy and the method by which Japan is accomplishing her purposes and the means which she has adopted to consummate her designs thus far in reference to her relations to China are precisely the same as they were in reference to her conduct toward Korea.

In 1894 Japan made a treaty of alliance with Korea, in which, in article 1, she declared:

The object of this alliance is to maintain the independence of Korea on a firm footing.

At the end of the Chinese war the treaty which concluded that war contained this clause:

Japan agrees definitely to the full and complete independence and autonomy of Korea.

In 1898 Japan and Russia made an agreement wherein the two Governments recognized "definitely the sovereignty and entire independence of Korea."

January 30, 1902, England and Japan made their first treaty of alliance. This treaty stated that both parties desired and undertook to maintain the territorial integrity of China and Korea and the "open door."

In opening the negotiations which preceded the war with Russia in 1903 Japan's declaration of war contained this statement:

Japan consequently considers her independence—

That of Korea—

absolutely essential to her own repose and safety.

In declaring war against Russia in 1904 the Emperor of Japan declared:

The integrity of Korea is a matter of grave concern to this empire. The separate existence of Korea is essential to the safety of our realm.

A few weeks after the war with Russia began—to wit, February 23, 1904—Japan concluded a protocol with Korea, article 3 of which reads:

The Imperial Government of Japan firmly guarantees the independence and territorial integrity of the Korean Empire.

Notwithstanding these declarations, on November 17, 1905, a little more than a year after the last was made, the Korean Emperor was compelled under duress to accept a convention with Japan, article 1 of which provided:

The Government of Japan will have the control and direction of the external relations and affairs of Korea.

In 1907 Japan prevented the representatives of the Korean Empire from having a hearing at The Hague conference.

In 1908 Prince Ito declared publicly, as Count Okuma has declared publicly with reference to China, that it was no part of Japan's purpose to annex Korea. That was in 1908.

In 1909 the same Prince Ito declared that Korea must be amalgamated with Japan.

In 1910 the Emperor of Korea finally surrendered the entire sovereignty of Korea to Japan. This was brought about by actual physical force.

Mr. President, I do not desire to comment further than to say that here were several separate, distinct agreements in which Japan undertook, not orally, not in a way which could be the subject of discussion or dispute, but in writing, in solemn treaties followed by public declarations, that she would protect and maintain the independence of Korea. These treaties and public declarations were ignored, and Korea was taken under the control of Japan in the face of declarations quite as explicit and quite as solemn as she makes now with reference to Shantung. I do not myself find very great reason to believe that this matter, which is already in dispute between the President and the representative of Japan, will be construed to the disadvantage of Japan, in view of the fact that her conduct toward Korea was always in the face of her written treaty agreements to protect Korea's independence.

What is the situation in Korea to-day? Since she has passed under the control of Japan the treatment of Korea by the Japanese at this time is one of the things which has lately shocked the conscience of the civilized world. For four years the facts have been kept from the people at large and from the world at large; but finally they have been gathered by Christian organizations and have been presented to the people of this country in such a way that they can not be doubted or disputed. I doubt if there is any greater cruelty to be found in the history of this war than the cruelties which have been practiced upon the Koreans by the Japanese people, whom they were under a solemn obligation to protect.

Now, having referred to the relationship of Japan to Korea, I want to take up her history with reference to her relationship with China. I call particular attention to a report which was made in 1914 or early 1915 by a military society in Japan known as the Black Dragon Society. It outlined what Japan should do, and prophesied impliedly, with remarkable accuracy, what Japan would do, with reference to China while this war was in progress. Anyone who has not already read this report will be interested in reading it because of the remarkable ability which is displayed by the author. The discussion of the European situation, and the questions which would arise out of the European war, and the problems which would be presented at the peace conference have nowhere been discussed with greater ability than in this report of the Black Dragon Society, made as early as the latter part of 1914 and the fore part of 1915. The report is a key to the whole program which followed. It shows the purpose, the methods to be used, and the bold ambition of Japan. No man can read it and doubt what it is Japan purposes to do in China. I read from the report:

Now is the most opportune moment for Japan to quickly solve the Chinese question. Such an opportunity will not occur for a hundred years to come. Not only is it Japan's divine duty to act now, but present conditions in China favor the execution of such a plan. We should by all means decide and act at once. Is it not, then, a vital necessity for Japan to solve at this very moment the Chinese question?

It will be observed by these people speaking for Japan, as subsequent events show, that the moment when many of the great nations of the world were engaged in the defense of civilization was the moment when Japan took advantage of the situation to extend her dominion over China. No time was to be lost. China was helpless, and the nations which might be interested in China were deeply concerned with graver matters. This is Machivellianism in its utmost refinement. Again, this report says:

For us to incite the Chinese revolutionists and malcontents to rise in China we consider the present to be the most opportune moment. The reasons why these men can not now carry on an active campaign is because they are insufficiently provided for funds.

Subsequent facts disclose that millions of dollars were sent into China to create trouble and work corruption among the people. There can be very little doubt in the mind of anyone who will investigate but what they not only attempted but succeeded in corrupting Chinese officials, and in different ways, through the expenditure of large sums of money, created trouble for the Chinese people, all the time proposing to act as friends and counselors. Further, this report says:

When we examine into the form of government in China we must ask whether the existing Republic is well suited to the national temperament and well adapted to the thoughts and aspirations of the Chinese people. * * * The retention of the republican form of government in China will be a great future obstacle in the way of a Chino-Japanese alliance. And why must it be so? Because in a republic the fundamental principles of government as well as the social and moral aims of the people are distinctly different from that of a constitutional monarchy. Their laws and administrations also conflict.

This is a thought which all supporters of the league who would join all kinds of government may well ponder. But, at any rate, Japan has from the beginning sought to undermine the republican form of government in China. Facts showing this are no longer subject to dispute. They have been especially active during the last four years. In closing this report we find this language:

These are important points in our policy toward China, and the result depends upon how we carry them out. Can our authorities firmly make up their mind to solve this Chinese question by the actual carrying out of this fundamental principle? If they show irresolution while we have this heaven-conferred chance and merely depend upon the good will of the other powers, we shall eventually have greater pressure to be brought against the Far East after the European war is over, when the present equilibrium will be destroyed. That day will then be too late for us to repent our folly.

There was no delay, neither was there folly, but with consummate wisdom when viewed from a selfish standpoint, with reremarkable boldness, the Japanese Government seems to have accepted this suggestion of the Dragon Society and to have gone forward. Shantung was always the center and heart of the program.

This, I say, is the report which was made public in the latter part of 1914 and the early part of 1915 by a powerful military organization composed of Japanese citizens. Its entire purpose was to urge upon the Government a policy which would bring China under the domination and control of Japan, setting out in detail how Japan could, once and for all, solve the Chinese question and establish her dominancy over the Chinese people.

Mr. President, if this thing had ended here, it could have been regarded perhaps as a mere fulmination upon the part of an imperialistic organization or society. But it did not end with a filing of the report. Within a very few weeks, by what are known to the world as the 21 demands, the program is initiated. The 21 demands came out of a clear sky against a nation with which Japan was at peace.

When we are discussing this question of Japan's relation to China and what is her purpose as to Shantung we ought to bear in mind that Japan was not dealing with a nation with which she was at war. In the midst of peace as between Japan and China, during a war for civilization, she presented to a nation friendly to the Allies a set of demands which would reduce her to absolute serfdom.

I invite the Senator from North Dakota to give particular attention to the 21 demands. Here is this group of demands which Japan made upon China on the 26th of April, 1915. The first one reads as follows:

The Chinese Government engages to give full assent to all matters upon which the Japanese Government may hereafter agree with the German Government, relating to the disposition of all rights, interests, and concessions which Germany, by virtue of treaties or otherwise, possesses in relation to the Province of Shantung.

As far back as the 26th of April, 1915, Japan manifested her determination to take permanent possession of Shantung. Remember, this was the territory of a friendly nation. She was then seeking to get her foothold in accordance with the theory of the Black Dragon Society; then was the accepted time for Japan to solve the Chinese question.

This is strong evidence that Japan intends to get possession of Shantung and not to return it to China. The only evidence to the contrary that I know of is what has been stated to us as contained in the procès-verbal—or, as we could well say, minutes of the meeting—that Japan said something to the effect that she would make this return. But, mind you, that has already been construed in two ways, one by the Japanese and the other by the President. The President has said to us that he feels under obligation to treat these minutes as secret, in other words, that he is not in a position to make them known to the world. I presume the President is in that position. I can easily understand how the President would not divulge the minutes, but it is up to Japan to divulge them. It is in Japan's hands to-day to settle this entire controversy. If Japan has made an agreement with four great powers, the whole civilized world is interested in knowing what it is. There can be no honest reason why Japan should conceal it.

The President, having made the obligation or entered into the understanding that he would not divulge it, is bound by it as a matter of personal honor, but not Japan. Let Japan make known to the people of the world what that procès-verbal is. Let us see the minutes of the meeting in view of the fact that in 1915 she had manifested her desire to take possession of this territory.

I read further from these 21 demands:

ART. 2. The Chinese Government engages that within the Province of Shantung and along its coast no territory or island will be ceded or leased to a third power under any pretext.

ART. 3. The Chinese Government consents to Japan's building a railway from Chefoo, or Lungkow, to join the Kiaochow-Tsinanfu Railway.

ART. 4. The Chinese Government engages, in the interest of trade and for the residence of foreigners, to open by herself as soon as possible certain important cities and towns in the Province of Shantung as commercial ports. What places are to be opened are to be jointly decided upon in a separate agreement.

GROUP II.

The Japanese Government and the Chinese Government, since the Chinese Government has always acknowledged the special position enjoyed by Japan in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia, agree to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The two contracting powers mutually agree that the term of lease of Port Arthur and Dalny and the term of lease of the South Manchurian Railway and the Antung-Mukden Railway shall be extended to the period of 99 years.

ART. 2. Japanese subjects in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia shall have the right to lease or own land required either for erecting suitable buildings for trade and manufacture or for farming.

ART. 3. Japanese subjects shall be free to reside and travel in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia and to engage in business and in manufacture of any kind whatsoever.

ART. 4. The Chinese Government agrees to grant to Japanese subjects the right of opening mines in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia. As regards what mines shall be opened they shall be decided upon jointly.

ART. 5. The Chinese Government agrees that in respect of the (two) cases mentioned herein below the Japanese Government's consent shall be first obtained before action is taken:

(a) Whenever permission is granted to the subject of a third power to build a railway or to make a loan with a third power for the purpose of building a railway in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia.

(b) Whenever a loan is to be made with a third power pledging the local taxes of South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia as security.

ART. 6. The Chinese Government agrees that if the Chinese Government employs political, financial, or military advisers or instructors in South Manchuria or Eastern Inner Mongolia the Japanese Government shall first be consulted.

ART. 7. The Chinese Government agrees that the control and management of the Kirin-Changchun Railway shall be handed over to the Japanese Government for a term of 99 years dating from the signing of this agreement.

GROUP III.

The Japanese Government and the Chinese Government, seeing that Japanese financiers and the Hanyehping Co. have close relations with each other at present, and desiring that the common interests of the two nations shall be advanced, agree to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The two contracting parties mutually agree that when the opportune moment arrives the Hanyehping Co. shall be made a joint concern of the two nations, and they further agree that without the previous consent of Japan China shall not by her own act dispose of the rights and property of whatsoever nature of the said company nor cause the said company to dispose freely of the same.

ART. 2. The Chinese Government agrees that all mines in the neighborhood of those owned by the Hanyehping Co. shall not be permitted, without the consent of said company, to be worked by other persons outside of the said company; and further agrees that if it is desired to carry out any undertaking which it is apprehended may directly or indirectly affect the interests of the said company the consent of the company shall first be obtained.

GROUP IV.

The Japanese Government and the Chinese Government with the object of effectively preserving the territorial integrity of China agree to the following special article:

The Chinese Government engages not to cede or lease to a third power any harbor or bay or island along the coast of China.

Mr. President, I call particular attention to group 5. Group 5 was regarded as most objectionable by China. It was finally put aside for further discussion. China resisted these demands in group 5, because she understood, as all can see, that it was a complete surrender of sovereignty to Japan. If you will recur to the demands made upon Korea you will be interested to see how similar in import, how remarkably alike in method, were the demands on Korea and China by Japan. But group 5 reveals beyond mistake just what Japan's plans are—the complete amalgamation of China. Anyone who reads group 5 and still doubts Japan's ambitions as to China has passed beyond the point where reason or argument can have sway. I read group 5:

ARTICLE 1. The Chinese Central Government shall employ influential Japanese as advisers in political, financial, and military affairs.

ART. 2. Japanese hospitals, churches, and schools in the interior of China shall be granted the right of owning land.

ART. 3. Inasmuch as the Japanese Government and the Chinese Government have had many cases of dispute between Japanese and Chinese police to settle, cases which caused no little misunderstanding, it is for this reason necessary that the police departments of important places (in China) shall be jointly administered by Japanese and Chinese, or that the police departments of these places shall employ numerous Japanese, so that they may at the same time help to plan for the improvement of the Chinese police service.

ART. 4. China shall purchase from Japan a fixed amount of munitions of war (say 50 per cent or more of what is needed by the Chinese Government) or there shall be established in China a Sino-Japanese jointly worked arsenal. Japanese technical experts to be employed and Japanese material to be purchased.

ART. 5. China agrees to grant to Japan the right of constructing a railway conecting Wuchang with Kiukiang and Nanchang, another line between Nanchang and Hangchow, and another between Nanchang and Chaochou.

ART. 6. If China needs foreign capital to work mines, build railways, and construct harbor work (including dockyard) in the Province of Fukien, Japan shall first be consulted.

ART. 7. China agrees that Japanese subjects shall have the right to propagate Buddhism in China.

When these 21 demands were presented to China, Japan insisted upon the utmost secrecy. The Chinese Government was informed that it would be much to their detriment if the demands were published or made known. Finally they did reach the public. This throws a flood of light upon the good faith of Japan in her dealings with the world. When these 21 demands reached the public Japan denied officially that any such demands had been made upon China, and when the fact became known beyond dispute Japan redrafted her 21 demands, re-formed them, reduced them in number, cutting out some of the most objectionable features, and sent them to the world as the original 21 demands.

When the outside world made inquiry concerning this matter it was answered by Japan with falsehood and deceit. Who denies it?

Mr. President, shortly after the 21 demands were made and after they had been made known to the world, after their redrafting and reconstruction and after group 5 had been eliminated for future consideration, Japan presents the treaty of 1915 upon which she now relies for her rights in China. I ask fair-minded men upon what basis did Japan present a treaty to China at all? Had she been at war with China? Had there been a conflict? Was there any settlement to be had between them? It was just the same, sirs, as if we should go to Canada and to-morrow morning demand that Canada cede to us important holdings in Canada.

Japan presented her treaty, which China declined to accept, and she gave her 48 hours, if I remember correctly, in which to accept the treaty which is now the basis of this moral obligation. Do we want to become a party to that treaty or indorse the manner in which it was obtained? China, being situated as she was, was compelled to accept and sign the treaty. She signed it under duress, as she stated, and has stated many times since.

Let it never be forgotten that Japan has no rights in Shantung except those based upon this treaty, a treaty which grew out of the Black Dragon report, a treaty which grew out of the 21 demands, a treaty which grew out of duress and force upon the part of a military power against a nation at peace and unprepared for war.

Mr. President, it is well known that Japan had thrown many obstacles in the way of China entering the war. If I remember correctly, the secret treaty which was made with France in 1917 has a provision to the effect that Japan would no longer interfere with China entering the war. The secret treaties of 1917 were made in March and February. Japan, knowing that China was to enter the war and would have a place at the peace table at Versailles or wherever it should meet, secretly approached England, Italy, and France and exacted from those nations under the conditions and the stress of war an agreement that her rights under the 1915 treaty should be protected at the peace conference. When they met at Versailles it was the secret treaties which were carried out and incorporated in the treaty of Versailles.

Now, Mr. President, here comes an incident which to my mind has no parallel in the history of duplicity. Count Ishii approached the United States to obtain from the United States a recognition of Japan's special rights in China. Before Count Ishii approached the United States he had made known to the representatives of other Governments—at least his Government made known to the representatives of other Governments—what the intention and purpose was, to wit, to acquire from the United States a recognition of the dominancy of Japan in China. When he met the Secretary of State of the United States for the purpose of securing this recognition his Government had in its possession at that time these secret treaties disposing of the rights of Germany in Shantung, all of which were concealed from the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State entered into an agreement known as the Lansing-Ishii agreement, which recognizes the special position or the special interest of Japan in China. Count Ishii sent it back to his country, presented it to China, and the Japanese press and semiofficially the Japanese Government construed it as an indorsement of the rights which Japan had obtained under the secret treaties which had been concealed from Lansing.

Sir, if there is a secret agreement at Versailles found in the minutes of the meeting it is trifling with common sense to talk about accepting it under these conditions unless we are permitted to see and to interpret it here.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. President, this entire matter is in the hands of Japan. Japan can state unmistakably and unequivocally what she proposes to do, and it is no discredit and no dishonor to any nation to put in writing what it proposes to do with reference to the rights of another nation. The United States enters into writing, all other Governments enter into writing, all nations bind themselves by written obligations. Under what process of reasoning can it be argued, as the Senator from North Dakota says, that it is an insult to Japan to ask her to put in writing what she proposes to do?

If the United States is to be asked to underwrite and guarantee a situation which arouses the ire of 400,000,000 people, it is right and proper that we shall know the express terms and conditions and not permit it to be construed or interpreted by three or four men only who have seen it and who already disagree as to its import. Remember this is of vital concern to the American people. Under article 10 of the league of nations our own blood may be shed over this affair. If Japan holds Shantung, we must help her hold it under article 10, for that vicious article takes no note of how territory is acquired. However dishonorably acquired, we still guarantee it against external attack. This secret agreement at Versailles, therefore, is of deep concern to the American people, and it is intolerable to suppose that it can be kept secret. Let us know its contents before we pledge ourselves to underwrite it.

Mr. President, I desire to touch briefly upon another subject matter relating to Japan's respect for treaty engagements and her attitude toward China. It may be considered by some as immaterial. To my mind it is of the utmost importance.

One of the most interesting features of Chinese history is the story of the opium habit and her final heroic effort to throw it off. For decades this fearfully destructive habit has fastened itself upon the Chinese people more and more. It seemed at one time that it would utterly destroy the moral fiber of the Chinese nation. The depths of misery and shame to which vast numbers of the Chinese people were reduced beggars description. In moral breakdown, in the universality of its spread, in the hopelessness of the millions of its victims, in the apparent helplessness of the nation to be rid of it, there is nothing anywhere to be found more revolting and at the same time more pitiable. It aroused the conscience and moved the heart of the Christian world.

Finally China by a most startling and extraordinary effort of moral power began to deal with the habit. By the aid of the outside world she made great progress. That which had seemed almost hopeless at last seemed assured, and it looked as if China was to be completely free of this curse. Indeed, at the beginning of the war she had practically conquered the habit, and her people were to a marked degree free from it. All right-thinking men everywhere greatly rejoiced. It was a fine assurance that there was indeed a future for the Chinese people. It gave unmistakable evidence that these 400,000,000 souls possessed the power to come back—the acid test of a great people.

In 1912 there was what was known as the opium convention at The Hague. The United States, Japan, and other nations entered into a convention or agreement with reference to the shipment of opium into foreign countries. The opium convention provided, first, that all the signatories to it would enact efficacious laws for the control and distribution of opium; second, to prohibit the exportation to countries which had prohibited its use; third, to provide laws requiring all packages containing opium to be marked or labeled; fourth, to prohibit the exportation or importation except through authorized persons.

Japan was a signer of that convention. She knew well how the Chinese people had struggled with heroic fortitude against this terrible habit. She knew well how for years they had been fighting against it until it had aroused the sympathy and stirred the heart of the world. She knew how at last the great nations came together for the purpose of obligating themselves to assist that great nation in relieving herself of the fearful habit. As soon as this late war opened Japan treated her opium treaty as a scrap of paper and immediately began to ship tons and tons of opium into China, and to-day she is using Shantung as a depot from which to distribute her opium into all quarters and parts of China.

I quote a paragraph from an article lately written by the noted student of Far Eastern questions, Dr. J. W. Jenks:

Perhaps history shows no other so heroic effort to free a people from a ruinous moral curse as that of China during the last 10 years in her efforts to free her people from the evils of opium and its compounds. The Government seemed to have succeeded to a most remarkable degree, as verified by British officials as well as by the almost universal testimony of foreigners resident in China; but within the last two or three years the Japanese, apparently with the full knowledge and connivance of the Japanese Government, have practically forced the Chinese to a backward step. The testimony seems absolute that during the year 1918, contrary to Japan's formal agreement at the opium conference, tons of opium and morphia were sent into China by the Japanese and with the connivance of the Japanese Government. The Outport and Overseas Supplement of the China Illustrated Weekly for February 15, 1919, mentions some 300 specific cases which it proved by actual purchase of morphia and opium from Japanese shops. The Japanese Government, in its denial of these charges, has simply cited its orders to the Japanese postal officials in China to the effect that no opium or morphine was to be sent through the mails. It omitted to state that another order provided that no package in the Japanese post office in China be opened. The charges stated that the opium was sent through the post office under false labels.

In Thomas F. Millard's late publication, entitled "Democracy and the Eastern Question," I find this paragraph:

China's long struggle against the opium traffic and habit is familiar to the world. When the great war began the traffic was on its last legs apparently. * * * Then the war came, disturbed and unsettled the administration of China and let down all bars to Japanese "penetration." How Japanese, with the connivance and often the actual help of the Japanese Government, took advantage of these circumstances to introduce and fasten another drug habit on the Chinese constitutes as black an action as has been charged to any nation in recent times.

In the same volume—page 211—is found a report which goes into detail in regard to the reintroduction of opium into China by Japan, showing that Japan has made millions out of it, and that since she took possession of Shantung has distributed morphia throughout the Province and now throughout China to a greater extent than ever before. I read a single paragraph from this report:

Literally tens of millions of yen are transferred annually from China to Japan for the payment of Japanese morphia. * * * When Chinese police raid the morphia shops along the Tsinanfu Railway in Shantung, as they have a right to do, for the traffic is illegal, Japanese gendarmeri rescue the arrested and exact a fine, not from the guilty, be it understood, but from those who attempted to uphold the law.

This is the nature of the business we are to indorse, approve, and become a party to when we make it possible for Japan to dominate Shantung. We, a Christian Nation, with our missionaries in China, are conniving at her moral degredation, at her absolute destruction. There is no reason assignable which will ever be satisfactory to the American people in putting them in such an indefensible attitude toward the Chinese people. Whatever else we are as a people, we are not thus sunk in immorality and debauchery. In a late publication by Arthur J. Brown, entitled "The Mastery of the Far East," I quote this paragraph—page 389:

Let anyone go into the villages of northern China and Manchuria and he will quickly learn what the Japanese are doing with such vast quantities of morphine. He will find hundreds of Japanese peddlers selling it to the natives under various labels, "white powder," "soothing stuff," "dreamland elixir," and in some instances the real name, morphine. Most of it comes in through the post. Several foreign Governments, including Japan, maintain their own post offices in China. The Chinese Government is not permitted to examine the packages, and the local Japanese obtain them direct. The Chinese magistrates are helpless, as they dare not interfere with the Japanese.

Mr. President, this record needs no further comment. It tells its own story. It must be revolting to every sense of right and every instinct of decency possessed by true Americans. But from expediency, or, rather, I would say, from sheer moral breakdown, it is argued we must become a partner, as it were, in this nefarious enterprise of undermining millions and destroying the character of an entire nation.

We are asked to underwrite a transaction upon the mere theory that Japan will keep her oral promise, which is already in dispute. I have, in common with all good Americans, a great deal of sympathy with struggling people wherever they are found. I should like to help China. I should like to help Ireland. I should like to help the struggling nations everywhere. But I say again that so far as I am concerned in this treaty problem I am interested first to keep the honor of the United States unsullied and to see that the young men of the United States are not called upon to underwrite these immoral transactions within which are incorporated the seeds of war. When this Republic assists other nations I want it to be upon her own initiative, of her own individual judgment, and then I shall feel that we are sure to act in justice and honor. I am sure this Republic would never become a party to such an affair as Shantung if permitted to act upon her own judgment or responsibility.

The United States should draw back as from a den of horror from underwriting a transaction which we know is the beginning of a contest between the Japanese people and 400,000,000 Chinamen.

But the able Senator declares your league of nations settles it! What did Japan do to the league of nations? There sat the league of nations at Versailles, stronger then than it will ever be again—Japan, Great Britain, France, the United States, and Italy. There was the league of nations, and Japan flouted the league of nations and said, "We will refuse to become a part of it unless we have Shantung." And yet the able Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] thinks if they return to the league of nations by some necromantic power not exactly clear to me the league of nations will have acquired the power to do in the second instance what it did not do or could not do or had not the moral courage to do in the first instance.

Mr. President, in this matter we are flying in the face of all experience by attempting a great wrong and expecting good to come of it. I do not assume a wisdom superior to my colleagues and certainly not superior to those who consented to this treaty. Nevertheless I know something of the history of government. I have read something of the story of man's efforts to make the world a fit place in which to live. I know that you can not do so by calling immorality morality, by calling injustice justice. You must do morality and you must do justice. You may call a thing a league for peace, but in it may be incorporated things which make it a league for war. I know that statutes based upon immorality are not only worthless as binding rules of human conduct but that they affirmatively break down and destroy the moral character of an entire people. Better no law at all than a law conceived in injustice; better leave all to the natural instincts of the human heart than to write an unjust and an immoral law for a people's guide. I know that treaties and international covenants based upon unrighteousness and in conflict with the first instincts of the human heart not only dishonor, degrade, and debauch all parties to the treaty and the members of the covenant, but I know that behind each and all such treaties lurk war and sacrifice. Retribution is the most unerring and persistent of all forms of earthly vengeance. You can trace it through the pages of history as you trace some fearfully contagious disease through a community. The fathers were exceedingly wise, but when they made a solemn compact in the name of human liberty and left within the compact a paragraph which sought to legalize and condone human slavery they planted the seeds of civil war, the most awful in all the annals of internecine strife. For every drop of blood drawn by the lash through the 250 years of unqualified toil God said the martyr should be paid another drawn by the sword.

America wants peace, but she will preserve her honor. America wants peace, but well she knows that peace is not to be found along the paths of faithlessness and oppression, of moral delinquency and crime. If we as a people are to give our approval to this betrayal of a trusting and struggling people, we will have taken from the creed of Prussianism its dominating principle, its most shocking precepts, and made them our very own, incorporated them into our national creed. While defeating Prussianism on the field of battle in physical encounter we will have accepted its most vicious, hideous doctrine unexpurgated and unmodified.

It was one of the fathers, I think Alexander Hamilton, who declared, "The honor of a nation is its life. Deliberately to abandon it is to commit an act of political suicide." The American people will not, when the facts are known, submit to any treaty which impeaches our national honor. They will not be a party to wrongdoing. They will not endure the disgrace which would attach to the underwriting of this unconscionable deed.

The Black Dragon Memorandum.

PART I. THE EUROPEAN WAR AND THE CHINESE QUESTION.

The present gigantic struggle in Europe has no parallel in history. Not only will the equilibrium of Europe be affected and its effect felt all over the globe but its results will create a new era in the political and social world. Therefore whether or not the Imperial Japanese Government can settle the Far Eastern question and bring to realization our great imperial policy depends on our being able to skillfully avail ourselves of the world's general trend of affairs so as to extend our influence and to decide upon a course of action toward China which shall be practical in execution. If our authorities and people view the present European war with indifference and without deep concern, merely devoting their attention to the attack on Kiaochow, neglecting the larger issues of the war, they will have brought to naught our great imperial policy and committed a blunder greater than which it can not be conceived. We are constrained to submit this statement of policy for the consideration of our authorities not because we are fond of argument but because we are deeply anxious for our national welfare.

No one at present can foretell the outcome of the European war. If the Allies meet with reverses and victory shall crown the arms of the Germans and Austrians, German militarism will undoubtedly dominate the European Continent and extend southward and eastward to other parts of the world. Should such a state of affairs happen to take place the consequences resulting therefrom will be indeed great and extensive. On this account we must devote our most serious attention to the subject. If, on the other hand, the Germans and Austrians should be crushed by the Allies, Germany will be deprived of her present status as a federated State under a kaiser. The federation will be disintegrated into separate States, and Prussia will have to be content with the status of a second-rate power. Austria and Hungary, on account of this defeat, will consequently be divided. What their final fate will be no one would now venture to predict. In the meantime Russia will annex Galicia and the Austrian Poland; France will repossess Alsace and Lorraine; Great Britain will occupy the German Colonies in Africa and the South Pacific; Serbia and Montenegro will take Bosnia, Herzegovina, and a certain portion of Austria territory, thus making such great changes in the map of Europe that even the Napoleonic War in 1815 could not find a parallel.

When these events take place not only will Europe experience great changes but we should not ignore the fact that they will occur also in China and in the South Pacific. After Russia has replaced Germany in the territories lost by Germany and Austria she will hold a controlling influence in Europe, and for a long time to come will have nothing to fear from her western frontier. Immediately after the war she will make an effort to carry out her policy of expansion in the East and will not relax her effort until she has acquired a controlling influence in China. At the same time Great Britain will strengthen her position in the Yangtze Valley and prohibit any other country from getting a footing there. France will do likewise in Yunnan Province, using it as her base of operations for further encroachments upon China and never hesitate to extend her advantages. We must therefore seriously study the situation, remembering always that the combined action of Great Britain, Russia, and France will not only affect Europe but that we can even foresee that it will also affect China.

Whether this combined action on the part of England, France, and Russia is to terminate at the end of the war or to continue to operate, we can not now predict. But after peace in Europe is restored these powers will certainly turn their attention to the expansion of their several spheres of interest in China, and, in the adjustment, their interests will most likely conflict with one another. If their interests do not conflict they will work jointly to solve the Chinese question. On this point we have not the least doubt. If England, France, and Russia are actually to combine for the coercion of China, what course is to be adopted by the Imperial Japanese Government to meet the situation? What proper means shall we employ to maintain our influence and extend our interests within this ring of rivalry and competition? It is necessary that we bear in mind the final results of the European war and forestall the trend of events succeeding it so as to be able to decide upon a policy toward China and determine the action to be ultimately taken. If we remain passive, the Imperial Japanese Government's policy toward China will lose that subjective influence and our diplomacy will be checked forever by the combined force of the other powers. The peace of the Far East will be thus endangered and even the existence of the Japanese Empire as a nation will no doubt be imperiled. It is therefore our first important duty at this moment to inquire of our Government what course is to be adopted to face that general situation after the war. What preparations are being made to meet the combined pressure of the Allies upon China? What policy has been followed to solve the Chinese question? When the European war is terminated and peace restored we are not concerned so much with the question whether it be the dual monarchies or the triple entente which emerge victorious, but whether, in anticipation of the future expansion of European influence in the Continents of Europe and Asia, the Imperial Japanese Government should or should not hesitate to employ force to check the movement before this occurrence. Now is the most opportune moment for Japan to quickly solve the Chinese question. Such an opportunity will not occur for hundreds of years to come. Not only is it Japan's divine duty to act now, but present conditions in China favor the execution of such a plan. We should by all means decide and act at once. If our authorities do not avail themselves of this rare opportunity, great duty will surely be encountered in future in the settlement of this Chinese question. Japan will be isolated from the European powers after the war and will be regarded by them with envy and jealousy just as Germany is now regarded. Is it not then a vital necessity for Japan to solve at this very moment the Chinese question?

PART II. THE CHINESE QUESTION AND THE DEFENSIVE ALLIANCE.

It is a very important matter of policy whether the Japanese Government, in obedience to its divine mission, shall solve the Chinese question in a heroic manner by making China voluntarily rely upon Japan. To force China to such a position there is nothing else for the Imperial Japanese Government to do but to take advantage of the present opportunity to seize the reins of political and financial power and to enter by all means into a defensive alliance with her under secret terms as enumerated below.

THE SECRET TERMS OF THE DEFENSIVE ALLIANCE.

The Imperial Japanese Government, with due respect for the sovereignty and integrity of China and with the object and hope of maintaining the peace of the Far East, undertakes to share the responsibility of cooperating with China to guard her against internal trouble and foreign invasion and China shall accord to Japan special facilities in the matter of China's national defense or the protection of Japan's special rights and privileges, and for these objects the following treaty of alliance is to be entered into between the two contracting parties:

1. When there is internal trouble in China or when she is at war with another nation or nations Japan shall send her army to render assistance, to assume the responsibility of guarding Chinese territory, and to maintain peace and order in China.

2. China agrees to recognize Japan's privileged position in south Manchuria and inner Mongolia and to cede the sovereign rights of these regions to Japan to enable her to carry out a scheme of local defense on a permanent basis.

3. After the Japanese occupation of Kiaochow, Japan shall acquire all the rights and privileges heretofore enjoyed by the Germans in regard to railways, mines, and all other interests, and after peace and order is restored in Tsingtao the place shall be handed back to China to be opened as an international treaty port.

4. For the maritime defense of China and Japan, China shall lease strategic harbors along the coast of the Fukien Province to Japan to be converted into naval bases and grant to Japan in the said Province all railway and mining rights.

5. For the reorganization of the Chinese Army China shall intrust the training and drilling to the army of Japan.

6. For the unification of China's firearms and munitions of war, China shall adopt firearms of Japanese pattern and at the same time establish arsenals (with the help of Japan) in different strategic points.

7. With the object of creating and maintaining a Chinese navy, China shall intrust the training of her navy to Japan.

8. With the object of reorganizing her finances and improving the methods of taxation, China shall intrust the work to Japan, and the latter shall elect competent financial experts, who shall act as first-class advisers to the Chinese Government.

9. China shall engage Japanese educational experts as educational advisers and extensively establish schools in different parts of the country to teach Japanese, so as to raise the educational standard of the country.

10. China shall first consult with and obtain the consent of Japan before she can enter into an agreement with another power for making loans, the leasing of territory, or the cession of the same.

From the date of the signing of this defensive alliance Japan and China shall work together hand in hand. Japan will assume the responsibility of safeguarding Chinese territory and maintaining the peace and order in China. This will relieve China of all future anxieties and enable her to proceed energetically with her reforms, and, with a sense of territorial security, she may wait for her national development and regeneration. Even after the present European war is over and peace is restored China will absolutely have nothing to fear in the future of having pressure brought against her by the foreign powers. It is only thus that permanent peace can be secured in the Far East.

But before concluding this defensive alliance two points must first be ascertained and settled: (1) Its bearing on the Chinese Government. (2) Its bearing on those powers having intimate relations with and great interests in China.

In considering its effect on the Chinese Government Japan must try to foresee whether the position of China's present ruler, Yuan Shih-kai, shall be permanent or not; whether the present Government's policy will enjoy the confidence of a large section of the Chinese people; whether Yuan Shih-kai will readily agree to the Japanese Government's proposal to enter into a treaty of alliance with us. These are points to which we are bound to give a thorough consideration. Judging by the attitude hitherto adopted by Yuan Shih-kai, we know he has always resorted to the policy of expediency in his diplomatic dealings, and although he may outwardly show friendliness toward us, he will in fact rely upon the influence of the different powers as the easiest check against us and refuse to accede to our demands. Take for a single instance his conduct toward us since the Imperial Government declared war against Germany and his action will then be clear to all. Whether we can rely upon the ordinary friendly methods of diplomacy to gain our object or not it does not require much wisdom to decide.

After the gigantic struggle in Europe is over, leaving aside America, which will not press for advantage, China will not be able to obtain any loans from the other powers. With a depleted treasury, without means to pay the officials and the army, with local bandits inciting the poverty-stricken populace to trouble, with the revolutionists waiting for opportunities to rise, should an insurrection actually occur while no outside assistance can be rendered to quell it, we are certain it will be impossible for Yuan Shih-kai, single-handed, to restore order and consolidate the country. The result will be that the nation will be cut up into many parts beyond all hope of remedy. That this state of affairs will come is not difficult to foresee. When this occurs, shall we uphold Yuan's government and assist him to suppress the internal insurrection, with the certain assurance that we could influence him to agree to our demands, or shall we help the revolutionists to achieve a success and realize our object through them? This question must be definitely decided upon this very moment, so that we may put it into practical execution. If we do not look into the future fate of China, but go blindly to uphold Yuan's government, to enter into a defensive alliance with China, hoping thus to secure a complete realization of our object by assisting him to suppress the revolutionists, it is obviously a wrong policy. Why? Because the majority of the Chinese people have lost all faith in the tottering Yuan Shih-kai, who is discredited and attacked by the whole nation for having sold his country. If Japan gives Yuan the support, his government, though in a very precarious state, may possibly avoid destruction. Yuan Shih-kai belongs to that school of politicians who are fond of employing craftiness and cunning. He may be friendly to us for a time, but he will certainly abandon us and again befriend the other powers when the European war is at an end. Judging by his past, we have no doubt as to what he will do in the future. For Japan to ignore the general sentiment of the Chinese people and support Yuan Shih-kai with the hope that we can settle with him the Chinese question is a blunder indeed. Therefore, in order to secure the permanent peace of the Far East, instead of supporting a Chinese government which can neither be long continued in power nor assist in the attainment of our object, we should rather support the 400,000,000 Chinese people to renovate their corrupt Government, to change its present form, to maintain peace and order in the land, and to usher into China a new era of prosperity, so that China and Japan may in fact as well as in name be brought into the most intimate and vital relations with each other. China's era of prosperity is based on the Chino-Japanese alliance, and this alliance is the foundational power for the repelling of the foreign aggression that is to be directed against the Far East at the conclusion of the European War. This alliance is also the foundation stone of the peace of the world. Japan, therefore, should take this as the last warning and immediately solve this question.

Since the Imperial Japanese Government has considered it imperative to support the Chinese people, we should induce the Chinese revolutionists, the Imperialists, and other Chinese malcontents to create trouble all over China. The whole country will be thrown into disorder and Yuan's Government will consequently be overthrown. We shall then select a man from amongst the most influential and most noted of the 400,000,000 of Chinese and help him to organize a new form of government and to consolidate the whole country. In the meantime our army must assist in the restoration of peace and order in the country, and in the protection of the lives and properties of the people, so that they may gladly tender their allegiance to the new government which will then naturally confide in and rely upon Japan. It is after the accomplishment of only these things that we shall without difficulty gain our object by the conclusion of a defensive alliance with China.

For us to incite the Chinese revolutionists and malcontents to rise in China we consider the present to be the most opportune moment. The reason why these men can not now carry on an active campaign is because they are insufficiently provided with funds. If the Imperial Government can take advantage of this fact to make them a loan and instruct them to rise simultaneously, great commotion and disorder will surely prevail all over China. We can intervene and easily adjust matters.

The progress of the European War warns Japan with greater urgency of the imperative necessity of solving this most vital of questions. The Imperial Government can not be considered as embarking on a rash project. This opportunity will not repeat itself for our benefit. We must avail ourselves of this chance and under no circumstances hesitate. Why should we wait for the spontaneous uprising of the revolutionists and malcontents? Why should we not think out and lay down a plan beforehand? When we examine into the form of government in China, we must ask whether the existing Republic is well suited to the national temperament and well adapted to the thoughts and aspirations of the Chinese people. From the time the Republic of China was established up to the present moment, if what it has passed through is to be compared to what it ought to be in the matter of administration and unification, we find disappointment everywhere. Even the revolutionists themselves, the very ones who first advocated the republican form of government, acknowledge that they have made a mistake. The retention of the republican form of government in China will be a great future obstacle in the way of a Chino-Japanese alliance. And why must it be so? Because, in a republic the fundamental principles of government as well as the social and moral aims of the people are distinctly different from that of a constitutional monarchy. Their laws and administration also conflict. If Japan act as a guide to China, and China model herself after Japan it will only then be possible for the two nations to solve by mutual effort the Far East question without differences and disagreements.

Therefore, to start from the foundation for the purpose of reconstructing the Chinese Government, of establishing a Chino-Japanese alliance, of maintaining the permanent peace of the Far East, and of realizing the consummation of Japan's imperial policy, we must take advantage of the present opportunity to alter China's republican form of Government into a constitutional monarchy, which shall necessarily be identical in all its details to the constitutional monarchy of Japan, and to no other. This is really the key and first principle to be firmly held for the actual reconstruction of the form of government in China. If China changes her republican form of Government to that of a constitutional monarchy, shall we, in the selection of a new ruler, restore the Emperor Hsuan T'ung to his throne or choose the most capable man from the monarchists, or select the most worthy member from among the revolutionists? We think, however, that it is advisable at present to leave this question to the exigency of the future, when the matter is brought up for decision. But we must not lose sight of the fact that to actually put into execution this policy of a Chino-Japanese alliance and the transformation of the Republic of China into a constitutional monarchy is in reality the fundamental principle to be adopted for the reconstruction of China.

We shall now consider the bearing of this defensive alliance on the other powers. Needless to say, Japan and China will in no way impair the rights and interests already acquired by the powers. At this moment it is of paramount importance for Japan to come to a special understanding with Russia to define our respective spheres in Manchuria and Mongolia, so that the two countries may cooperate with each other in the future. This means that Japan after the acquisition of sovereign rights in South Manchuria and inner Mongolia will work together with Russia after her acquisition of sovereign rights in North Manchuria and outer Mongolia to maintain the status quo, and endeavor by every effort to protect the peace of the Far East. Russia since the outbreak of the European war has not only laid aside all ill feelings against Japan, but has adopted the same attitude as her allies and shown warm friendship for us. No matter how we regard the Manchurian and Mongolian questions in the future she is anxious that we find some way of settlement. Therefore, we need not doubt but that Russia in her attitude toward this Chinese question will be able to come to an understanding with us for mutual cooperation.

The British sphere of influence and interest in China is centered in Tibet and the Yangtze Valley. Therefore, if Japan can come to some satisfactory arrangement with China in regard to Tibet and also give certain privileges to Great Britain in the Yangtze Valley, with an assurance to protect those privileges, no matter how powerful Great Britain might be, she will surely not oppose Japan's policy in regard to this Chinese question. While this present European war is going on Great Britain has never asked Japan to render her assistance. That her strength will certainly not enable her to oppose us in the future need not be doubted in the least.

Since Great Britain and Russia will not oppose Japan's policy toward China it can readily be seen what attitude France will adopt in regard to the subject. What Japan must now somewhat reckon with is America. But America in her attitude toward us regarding our policy toward China has already declared the principle of maintaining China's territorial integrity and equal opportunity, and will be satisfied if we do not impair America's already acquired rights and privileges. We think America will also have no cause for complaint. Nevertheless America has in the East a naval force which can be fairly relied upon, though not sufficiently strong to be feared. Therefore, in Japan's attitude toward America there is nothing really for us to be afraid of.

Since China's condition is such on the one hand and the Powers' relation toward China is such on the other hand, Japan should avail herself in the meantime of the European war to definitely decide upon a policy toward China, the most important move being the transformation of the Chinese Government, to be followed up by preparing for the conclusion of the defensive alliance. The precipitate action on the part of our present Cabinet in acceding to the request of Great Britain to declare war against Germany without having definitely settled our policy toward China has no real connection with our future negotiations with China or affects the political condition in the Far East. Consequently all intelligent Japanese, of every walk of life throughout the land, are very deeply concerned about the matter.

Our Imperial Government should now definitely change our dependent foreign policy which is being directed by others into an independent foreign policy which shall direct others, proclaiming the same with solemn sincerity to the world and carrying it out with determination. If we do so even the gods and spirits will give way. These are important points in our policy toward China, and the result depends on how we carry them out. Can our authorities firmly make up their mind to solve this Chinese question by the actual carrying out of this fundamental principle? If they show irresolution while we have this heaven-conferred chance and merely depend on the good will of the other powers we shall eventually have greater pressure to be brought against the Far East after the European war is over, when the present equilibrium will be destroyed. That day will then be too late for us to repent our folly. We are therefore impelled by force of circumstances to urge our authorities to a quicker sense of the situation and to come to a determination.

(Translation from "The Fight for the Republic in China," by B. L. Putnam-Weale. Copyright, 1917, by Dodd, Mead & Co., Inc.)

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I regret that I was called out of the Chamber so that I could not hear all of the address of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], but he has presented one or two propositions that can not go unchallenged.

Mr. President, when as a boy I read in the history of the United States what was declared to be a glorious feat on the part of the American Navy, when Admiral Perry, with loaded guns, awoke Japan from her state of lethargy and commanded her to open her ports and Japan opened those ports at his demand, I never could agree that it was a moral act or that it was an act in which we ought to take a great deal of pride. So I agree with the Senator from Idaho that such acts are immoral.

I have never agreed, no matter what great benefit we got out of it, and no matter what great State was added to our Union, that making a war on Mexico to get added territory, by which we could balance the sentiment of one section against that of another section, was a moral act on the part of the United States. I have never agreed that the exercise of the power of Great Britain in compelling China to give her certain rights at Shanghai was in every respect a moral act. I have never asserted that Japan in compelling China to sign a treaty whereby she gave to Japan just what she had to give to other nations was in all respects moral. All I have asserted, Mr. President, is that we are in no position to claim that Japan has committed a wrong against China so long as we viséed all of the other acts that have been committed in the same way by every other Caucasian nation of the world.

Of course we would all have been glad if Japan had not attempted to make China give her the same rights that China gave to Great Britain, to France, to Russia, and to other countries; we would be pleased if Great Britain would yield her rights in China back to China and if Japan and Russia would do the same thing; but, Mr. President, we were met with a situation in Paris; we had to deal with conditions as they existed and not as we would wish them to be. I believe that we dealt with the conditions in the best possible way they could have been dealt with at the time.

Notwithstanding the declarations of the Senator from Idaho concerning the infidelity of Japan in all of her past history, I say that I do believe that she will keep this treaty obligation with China; and I have given my reason for so believing.

The first reason is that she has made that promise not to China alone but that she has declared it to every civilized nation upon the face of the earth. Nor is that all. If Japan broke her treaty with Korea, she had a treaty with Korea only, and we could not protest. If she enters into this league and does not keep good her word, then she breaks her treaty with every nation worth mentioning upon the face of the earth; and that, Mr. President, is worth something.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. If Japan is of the vicious character portrayed by the Senator from Idaho, then, for God's sake, let us put her in chains; bring her into this league and bind her by the power of the greater nations of the world. But I do not believe that that will be necessary.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield for a question to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I understood that the league was only a moral obligation.

Mr. OWEN. That is sufficient.

Mr. BORAH. For Japan?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, yes, there is a moral obligation upon the part of every member of the league that they will compel every other nation to keep its moral obligations. Stop right there if you will. If that moral obligation is not of sufficient force to compel its being carried into effect, then, Mr. President, we have sunk so low that the world is not worth saving. I do not believe that for a single moment. I believe that the nations of the world can be depended upon to keep faith; and if under present conditions there is no power on earth to compel one nation to keep its agreement with another nation, I believe there will be a power created by the league of nations, with all of its cross-agreements, and, with the fidelity and honor of every nation pledged, to make every recalcitrant country respond to its national honor. I believe that result can be accomplished. I care not whether you call it a legal obligation or a moral obligation. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator has passed by what I wanted to ask him about, but I will, with his permission, refer to it. He says that while Japan violated her treaty with Korea——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I did not say that; I will convict no country without a hearing; I would hang no man upon an ex parte hearing; and I will not say that Japan has broken her treaty with Korea or what the conditions were, whether she was justified or not, until I have been able to study and consider and weigh both sides of that question. So, do not place me in the position of saying that Japan has broken her treaty with Korea.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not intend, of course, to place the Senator in any position contrary to the one he wishes to be placed in. If I could have asked my question at the time——

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask the Senator's pardon for not yielding.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not have prefaced it with a remark, but I was not permitted to interrupt the Senator. I take it from what the Senator has said that he did make some reference—and I think if he will read his words in the RECORD, if they are not changed, he will find that I am justified in the statement I made——

Mr. McCUMBER. I made reference to what the Senator from Idaho had stated.

Mr. NORRIS. At any rate, the Senator drew a distinction between Japan breaking her word with one nation and breaking it with all the world; and he said, even though the other charge may be true, this is a treaty with all the nations of the world, and Japan has given her pledge to all the world. With that preface I can ask my question, and I ask the Senator where is there a single word or sentence in this treaty with all the world which obligates Japan in any way to give anything back to anybody?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I gave that information in my address before any questions were asked. There is an obligation in the treaty, in the league of nations covenant, that every nation signing that agreement will scrupulously observe its treaty obligation.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator claim that there is anything in this treaty with the world of which the Senator speaks, and if so will he point it out to me, that requires Japan to give anything back to China?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to finish, I will state there is in the league of nations covenant a provision that binds Japan to keep her obligations, and one of her obligations is to return the German rights to China.

Mr. NORRIS. Where? I should like to have the Senator read from the treaty that obligation.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from North Dakota is referring to the treaty of 1915.

Mr. NORRIS. I am referring to what the Senator refers to, a treaty with all the nations of the world, the treaty of peace with Germany containing the league of nations.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I read from the covenant of the league of nations as follows:

In order to promote international cooperation and to achieve international peace and security—

How?

by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war.

Next—

By the prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations.

By the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask again, does the Senator claim that there is anything in the treaty from which he has just read a portion of the preamble that obligates Japan to return Shantung to China?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have stated that there is in the treaty a provision to compel Japan to keep scrupulously her obligations, and the treaty whereby she agrees to return the German rights to China is one of her agreements with China.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, then, is referring to the treaty of 1915?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator claim that treaty was made under conditions that entitle it to any respect by any civilized nation?

Mr. McCUMBER. It was made under the same conditions as every treaty made between China and other nations by which China surrendered her territory and her rights.

Mr. NORRIS. That still does not answer my question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. There are treaties made under duress; that is admitted.

Mr. NORRIS. That is admitted.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is admitted that there are treaties made under duress, but they are nevertheless treaties; they are nevertheless binding obligations. The treaty that we make with Germany to-day is a treaty made under duress, but it is nevertheless a binding obligation upon Germany.

Mr. NORRIS. We have been at war with Germany. The Senator will not contend, will he, that at the time the treaty of 1915 between Japan and China was made that there was any war existing between those countries?

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; and when the agreement was made to transfer rights over to Russia there was not any war, and when Great Britain obtained her rights there was no war.

When Italy obtained her concessions there was no war; but they were all obtained in exactly the same way, by a show of superior force.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will not the Senator admit that China or any other nation in giving concessions might have a choice, might be willing to give a certain concession to England and not be willing to give the same concession to Japan? Is not that true?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, if China was forced to enter into the treaty with Japan, what legal or moral effect should it have on us?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have not claimed that it should have any moral effect on us, one way or the other. All I am saying is that we are in no position to say that Germany shall not renounce to Japan what Japan took from Germany, which we did not help her take from Germany, but which she took herself, and which she took in the light of an agreement she made with China that she might have what she could secure from Germany, because China was not able to do it and would not be able to do it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator has stated that the obligations imposed by the pending treaty are moral obligations only. Is that right?

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not say that.

Mr. WATSON. Well, is that right?

Mr. McCUMBER. No.

Mr. WATSON. Then there are obligations stronger than moral obligations?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I do not think there are any obligations stronger than moral obligations, but there is the legal obligation as much as a treaty can be made a legal obligation, because there is no appeal except to the moral sense of the country, and therefore the legal obligation has its backing in the moral conscience of the country that makes the agreement.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely. Now, accepting the Senator's statement, is not Japan at this time under a moral obligation to restore Shantung to China?

Mr. McCUMBER. She is if China keeps her word, and when she gets the thing that she can return.

Mr. WATSON. What does the Senator mean?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. Japan has not yet received from Germany the German rights, except as she has received them by conquest. When she receives them by treaty, then her treaty with China comes into force, whereby she agrees to return them to China if China keeps her agreement.

Mr. WATSON. Does not the Senator believe that the very day that China declared war against Germany, all of Germany's rights in Shantung immediately reverted to China?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, no, Mr. President; of course not. Why? First, because those rights had been taken by Japan before China ever declared war; and, secondly, because China had ceded those rights to Japan before China ever declared war, and therefore an after declaration of war by China certainly could not refer back and destroy her own obligation made with Japan. Neither could it refer back and destroy what Japan had taken from Germany.

Mr. WATSON. But is not the Senator aware of the fact that in the treaty between Germany and China, at the time Germany wrenched these possessions in Shantung from China, it was expressly stipulated that they were nonassignable and nontransferable?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, of course; but if China herself assigned them afterwards, then China assigned the rights that she had; and China did that, and she did it before she ever declared war.

Mr. WATSON. But does not the Senator recognize that when China did that under the treaty of 1915 she was acting wholly under duress, and that those rights were wrenched from China by Japan in precisely the same manner that Germany had wrenched those rights from China?

Mr. McCUMBER. Ninety-nine out of one hundred of all the treaties made in the world have been made because one country is greater in power and exacts them from another; and therefore, if we set aside every treaty on the ground that undue influence or a threat of power secured it, there would be mighty few treaties left in existence.

Mr. WATSON. There are two answers to that proposition. The first is that this is the one problem that we are called upon to deal with now. We are not called on to deal with all the other thousands of treaties that have been made under duress, but the one proposition that is presented to us here and now is this proposition. That is the first answer.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; and I am going to answer that in a minute.

Mr. WATSON. The second answer is that we have come now to a new day; we are now seeing sunlight in the East; we are hearing voices in the air.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is about time we did.

Mr. WATSON. We are now upon the mountain top; we are dealing in a new idealism, when the old things have passed away and all things have become new; and in the light of this new thing that the Senator stands here from day to day to advocate, does he claim that it fits in with the moral obligations that are now resting upon the world in accordance with the new interpretations of things?

Mr. McCUMBER. I certainly do agree that it accords with an interpretation of all honorable things and things that ought to be done between nations, and I believe that China should keep her word, if that is one of the new order of things; then I believe that Japan should keep her word, if that is the new order of things; and then I believe that if Japan does not keep her word she should be forced to keep her word, if that is the new order of things.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question about that particular feature of the subject?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator had called to his attention the provision of the constitution of the Republic of China, under which, as I read it, the treaty that the Senator is now contending is legal even though obtained by duress would have, in order to be legal under the constitution, to receive the approval of the Chinese legislative body provided by the constitution?

Mr. McCUMBER. Things were rather uncertain in China. It was uncertain what the government was at that time or who was in control, just exactly as it has been in many of our South American Republics. Why, I believe that Colombia claimed that she could not make any agreement with the United States at one time because her legislature had no power to cede territory or to agree that any territory might be ceded. I know there are a thousand excuses that one might put up that this Nation did not act in accordance with the will of its people, or that it did not act in accordance with the legislative rights, or its own Constitution, to whatever extent that Constitution was applied; but what I want to say is that the treaty was obtained in the same way that the other treaties were obtained.

Mr. NORRIS. But the other treaties were obtained before the establishment of the Chinese Republic. Now, will not the Senator admit that at that time China was a Republic, working under a written constitution that was recognized by our Government?

Mr. WILLIAMS. We did not recognize the constitution. We recognized a government.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, we recognized a government that existed under a written constitution.

Mr. McCUMBER. One day she had a constitution and the next day she did not have any. One day she was living under a constitution and the next day she was conducting herself as a purely autocratic government; and Heaven knows which one of these days it was on which the treaty was agreed to. I am not prepared to say.

Mr. NORRIS. I will not interrupt the Senator further now. As soon as the Senator concludes I will read into the RECORD a provision of the Chinese constitution.

Mr. McCUMBER. But anyway, Mr. President, that is far afield, because whether or not it was obtained through the constitutional requirements of the Chinese form of government, the main feature is that Japan agrees to return it. That is what I want to hold on to, and do not want Senators to forget it.

Now I am going to answer the Senator from Indiana. Let us see. The Senator from Indiana, as I understand, takes the position—and the Senator from Idaho also takes the same position—that the United States should wash its hands clean of this Shantung matter entirely and have nothing to do with it. Am I right in that?

Mr. WATSON. That is my position, Mr. President.

Mr. McCUMBER. Good.

Mr. WATSON. In other words, I concur in the action of the Senator's committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no, Mr. Senator; you do not concur.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; but I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. If you wanted to concur in that sentiment, you had a clear and easy way to accomplish it. What would have been your amendment? Your amendment would have been to strike out sections 156, 157, and 158.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a minute. Then we would have washed our hands clean of the whole matter.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a minute; I want to finish the sentence. But you did not do that. You did not want to do that. What you wanted to do was to slap Japan in the face. What you wanted to do was to create such a feeling between Japan and the United States that it would be almost impossible for Japan to comply with the treaty; and therefore, instead of washing your hands of it you as a third party step in and compel Germany to transfer the German rights, not to Japan, but to China.

You make a different agreement with Germany. That is not washing our hands clean of that subject by any means. It is getting into it in such a way that we will have to wash our hands in blood unless Japan backs down, and you are putting her in a position where she can scarcely honorably back down. You are insulting her and her people by a declaration that she can not be trusted. What is left for her to do? Only to say, "I will then stand upon my rights of conquest. You have made China break her treaty, and made Germany break her treaty by which she agreed to transfer this to me."

The people of Japan fought, bled, and died in that conquest to conquer territory that China dared not attempt to get. The Japanese people have feeling. They have sentiment. They have a national pride. The Government of the United States must take cognizance of that national pride. You, as Americans, know how difficult it is to pull down the American flag wherever the soldiers of America have planted it on foreign and conquered territory; and therefore you must know how difficult it is for the Government of Japan, with a live people, to pull down the Japanese flag, stained with the blood of Nipponese soldiers, at the command of a foreign power. They would do it willingly, I believe, if allowed to do so by their own volition, because their treaty bound them to do it. But when we say to them "We will make you do it; we will not give you a chance to keep your word," do you not imagine that they have enough of a sense of pride and of manhood to resent it? They would not be worthy of national existence, Mr. President, if they did not have that pride and resentment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator anticipate any difficulty with England on the line of pulling down her flag in Belgium, or with America in pulling down her flag in Alsace-Lorraine?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator leads me right into the next proposition. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] presents here, with all the force of his oratorical powers, the declaration that Japan seized these rights from China, that she seized them from her ally. Both are untrue. She neither seized them from China nor seized them from her ally. Why? China admitted that she could not do anything.

Mr. WATSON. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. She could not take these rights away from Germany. Japan could do it. Japan took the Province from Germany, and whatever Japan received she got from Germany. She did not get it from China.

Mr. WATSON. Does not the Senator know, Mr. President, that China wanted to take possession of Kiaochow, and that Japan interfered and would not permit China to do it?

Mr. McCUMBER. No. I do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. WATSON. Does not the Senator know that it would have been a comparatively easy task for China, with Germany isolated as she was from the rest of the world, and that the Chinese soldiers could have gone in and starved that colony to death very easily?

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; I do not concede that for a single minute.

Mr. WATSON. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. If Germany had 1,000 soldiers there, or 500 soldiers there, and they were armed, all China, with its 300,000,000 people, could not have dislodged them.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, well, Mr. President, that is the fact. We have had so much of this declaration of war on the part of China and her power and what she has done and can do, that I think we might as well get right down to the facts. She was not able to dislodge Germany.

Mr. WATSON. Notwithstanding the Senator's declaration, does he not know that China wanted to take Kiaochow and that she insisted upon taking Kiaochow, and Japan stretched forth her arm and said, "No; you can not take it; you must let it alone"? Does not the Senator know that to be true?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I do not.

Mr. WATSON. Whether China could or could not have taken it, does he not know that to be the historic fact?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I do not.

Mr. WATSON. Then I fear the Senator from North Dakota has little studied the question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator from North Dakota has studied the question as well as the Senator from Indiana, and I deny the proposition that Japan prevented China from doing it. She never encouraged her. That she discouraged her may be true. That she prevented 300,000,000 people from seizing Kiaochow I deny. China did not have the courage to do it nor the means to do it.

Do not think that the Japanese had a very quiet, easy job. She is a fighting little nation, as the world found out, but it took her some months before she got control of all the German rights and before she defeated the Germans.

Mr. WATSON. May I ask the Senator a further question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator not know that when Japan took possession of Kiaochow she was not content with possessing herself of what Germany possessed, but she landed her troops 100 miles farther away, then she sent Japanese troops clear up to Chefoo, 250 miles, established garrisons and established post offices, and took military possession of the whole of Shantung? Was that essential in order to take the German rights in Shantung?

Mr. McCUMBER. I might go into that, Mr. President, but it is a long question. I am not going into the question of what Japan thought was necessary from a military standpoint to hold what she had taken from Germany. I am willing to concede, if the Sentor wants to make the claim, that Japan had some ulterior motive and she expected to keep the territory. What I am concerned with is the ultimate result of the action of China and Japan as put down in black and white and signed by them. I know what that is.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] read into the RECORD the fifth group of the 21 demands, and yet the Senator knew, as we all know, that Japan abandoned those entirely when she finally signed the treaty.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I, of course, may be wrong, but I ask the Senator if it is not true that Japan never yet has abandoned them; that they are still held in abeyance; that there is not anything in the record anywhere to indicate that they have been abandoned, but that they can be taken up at any moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will read the notes that passed between Japan and China, he will find that they did abandon them and, finally, when we came down to the final treaty, all that was left of them were these demands: First, that China shall open up a port; secondly, that Japan shall have a right of settlement; thirdly, that the German properties, the national properties, would be disposed of through an agreement between Japan and China. The other matter, to say the most of it, from your standpoint, was merely left in abeyance.

Mr. NORRIS. It was withheld, as I understand it.

Mr. McCUMBER. It was not agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. No; group 5——

Mr. McCUMBER. It was not agreed to by China.

Mr. NORRIS. It was not agreed to by China, but it has not been withdrawn by Japan. It was temporarily withheld.

Mr. McCUMBER. She can make that over again and she can make a million others. I do not think that has anything to do with the question now. This is what Japan has agreed to do, and this she is bound to do.

Mr. WATSON. Group 5 was made the subject of the exchange of a few notes, and there it stands in that status. It has not been modified or altered or changed in the least and Japan may insist on that at any time.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not binding on China to-day, is it?

Mr. WATSON. No; it is not binding on China.

Mr. McCUMBER. Put China into this league; put Japan into this league, and Japan will never attempt to enforce group 5. She could not. The league could not allow it under the provisions and terms of the league itself.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does the Senator say that in the light of the British-Persian treaty, with the terms of which he is no doubt familiar, if he reads the newspapers?

Mr. McCUMBER. All right. Is Persia in the league of nations?

Mr. MOSES. She will be, Mr. President, if she accepts the invitation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is she to-day? There is no use answering it in an evasive way. The league of nations provides for the members of the league. It has nothing to do with a proposition made outside. Persia is not a member of the league of nations to-day.

Mr. FALL. Who is, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. McCUMBER. When we get into it we will find out who. If the Senator from New Mexico has his way, of course, there will not be any league and no one will be bound by it, but for the present there are certain nations that under the treaty are included in the league.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. The Senator is much more correct in stating the position of the Senator from New Mexico than in his conception of the views of the Senator from New Mexico with reference to other assertions that he has made.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am sorry if I have not pleased the Senator or agreed with the Senator entirely.

Mr. FALL. I am thoroughly pleased, but I rose to ask for some information from the Senator.

The Senator has said that the committee voted to put China in the place of Japan in the Shantung articles, and slap Japan in the face. In the first place, I desire to state that the Senator is not correct in making that statement. In the event the committee had followed the suggestion made by the Senator and had simply stricken out the Shantung article from this treaty and such action had been ratified, where would the Shantung Province have been under the treaty? The Senator is, of course, familiar with it.

Mr. McCUMBER. When the Senator is through, I will endeavor to answer. He has asked two questions, and I will answer each of them when he is through.

Mr. FALL. I am asking only one question. I said, if we had stricken out the Shantung article, according to the Senator's suggestion that we should have done it, if we had not the desire to insult Japan——

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I did not say that; not in that way; but go ahead.

Mr. FALL. My object is to know if we had done what the Senator suggested, and had simply stricken out the Shantung article and this treaty was ratified, what position would the territory of Shantung under that treaty be in?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just where it is to-day.

Mr. FALL. Where?

Mr. McCUMBER. To-day Japan holds it.

Mr. FALL. Does not the Senator know that under the other provisions of the treaty the territory under the treaty, disposition of which is not specifically provided for in the treaty itself, goes under the general clauses to the five principal allied and associated powers?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not think where the treaty provides that certain territory goes to a certain country and then you amend that treaty by striking the whole provision out that the territory would fall under another general provision, because it is a special matter on which the minds of the nations have met and it would simply be a new treaty that would come before them.

Mr. FALL. Apparently the minds of the nations have not met.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, if it goes back and all would agree to striking out the entire provision, it might go just where the Senator suggests.

Mr. FALL. The object of my question was simply to develop the fact that the Senator has stated. If we had not desired, or if the committee had not desired, to slap Japan in the face and to insult Japan or make an enemy of Japan; if we had simply desired to wash our hands of it, we would have stricken out the Shantung article. I say the inevitable result under the treaty itself would have been to vest all the title that Germany might have had in Shantung in the five principal allied and associated nations. Then what would have been the result? We being one of the associated nations having the disposition of Shantung, would the Senator then have voted to give it to Japan?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would not vote for any of these propositions. So the Senator is hardly in position to ask me if I had already committed a wrong what would I do then to add to that wrong. Now, let me answer the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I should be glad to have the Senator do so. That is the purpose of my question.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has not correctly stated my assertion. My assertion is that when you have a treaty whereby Germany renounces in favor of Japan what Japan has taken from Germany and declare that the renunciation shall be in favor of another country which did nothing toward securing it, that is a slap in the face of Japan. That answers the Senator's first proposition. The Senator's second statement relates simply to the question of what would be done with the German concessions if we had stricken it out entirely. What I stated was that if you wanted to wash your hands clear of the subject it could have been accomplished by striking out the whole thing rather than slapping Japan in the face by taking from her what she has taken by force of arms and giving it to a country that was too proud to fight for it, or too cowardly, I do not know which.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose the committee had taken the course which the Senator has suggested and had just stricken out those three clauses, there would have been no mention of Shantung or Kiaochow in the treaty. Then there would have been left still a claim by Germany to her old property and still a claim by Japan under her treaty with China, and the two would have been left to fight it out with one another.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; there can be no question about it.

Again, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] finds some fault, I think, with the attitude of Japan in not publishing to the world some secret meeting minutes whereby it is asserted that she agreed to return the German concessions to China. Inasmuch as she has agreed to it in a public treaty and has reiterated half a hundred times that she would comply with her treaty, why should you ask her to produce something else which may be of a secret nature to the same effect?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield in a minute. The President gave his reasons. He stated that in those debates there was some feeling expressed, some acrimonious remarks made, and that it would be improper to publish them to the world. I do not know what they are, but I do know that if Japan should agree to a certain thing a thousand times, she could not make them any stronger than she has made them in her note to China whereby she declared positively that upon these conditions she will return them all to China.

I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the agreement which is supposed to be in the minutes at Versailles is a wholly different agreement, according to the President's statement, from the agreement which is in the treaty of 1915. It is a different understanding and a different agreement entirely. The President refused to abide by the terms of the treaty of 1915, and had a different agreement with Japan, and that is the agreement which is kept secret.

Mr. McCUMBER. How does the Senator know it is a different treaty?

Mr. BORAH. The President said so in his letter in reply to China.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know that there is any difference on this particular proposition. There is no difference concerning the agreement of Japan to return the German concessions to China. The President so declared. Japan has declared it so many times and the President believes Japan will keep her word. I believe she will keep her word, and if she does not keep her word, and if we have a league of nations, then I believe we will compel her to keep her word.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. I was going to ask the Senator if he had overlooked the President's statement that he had specifically declined to recognize the treaty of 1915?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not overlooked it. It does not make much difference whether the President declined to do so or not; the fact remains that the treaty signed by the delegates of the United States and Germany and all the other nations did provide that the renunciation should be made by Germany in favor of Japan, and that settled the statements and declarations and attempts previously made.

Mr. WATSON. Has the Senator forgotten that the President himself said he did not like this? He is not in sympathy with it. None of the representatives over there were in favor of it; that they regarded it as an immoral proposition, but it was the one thing that was essential to save the league, and that was the only justification for it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think I have stated again and again that I would be far better pleased if Japan had not exacted these concessions from China. But Japan saw fit to stand upon her rights. I doubt if the present administration of Japan could remain in power if Japan were not allowed to stand upon those rights and to give the German concessions back to China, just as she has promised that she will give them back, without attempted coercion by another power.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. FALL. Those of us who are opposing this proposition, and those of us upon the committee who voted to insert China in lieu of Japan, voted, or at least I voted, for that amendment because the Shantung provision here constituted a joining of the United States, Great Britain, Italy, and Japan in forcing Germany to give Shantung to Japan, not to China. This is a treaty by which we join in forcing Germany to give possession of the Shantung Province to Japan. The Senate of the United States, in so far as the majority of the committee is concerned, has said we do not agree in that. We agree that Germany shall be forced to give it to China, not to Japan.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I understand the Senator's position as declared by him. The Senator stated a moment ago that he did not vote for it to give Japan a slap. It does not make much difference what your intentions are when you do slap a country in the face, the result is the same.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Whether you call it a slap or whether you say it was a gentle hint, or what other term you may apply to it, Japan must accept it as it is given.

Mr. FALL. The Senator has just used the word "slap" when a few moments ago when I was attempting to ask him a question and formulating a premise I understood him to say that he did not use the word "slap."

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; I did not say I did not use that word.

Mr. FALL. I am going to quote, with the Senator's permission now, because——

Mr. McCUMBER. Because I did use it and I have not forgotten it. I used it in my address before I was interrupted, and I have used it again since.

Mr. FALL. I will not interrupt the Senator to call his attention to what he did say, but I will take my own time to reply to several assertions that have been made.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator can make the reply right now.

Mr. FALL. I propose to reply to some statements attacking the intentions of the committee with reference to this matter, and I shall do it in my own time.

Mr. McCUMBER. It makes very little difference to me what the intentions are, provided they all look toward a certain purpose, and the purpose is clear to everyone; it is clear to Japan and clear to this country.

Mr. FALL. I am glad Japan has such an eloquent and learned interpreter.

Mr. McCUMBER. The purpose of the Senate is to kill the treaty. I say that I have no quarrel with those who want to kill it as to the method by which they accomplish that result. They have a perfect right to do it that way if they see fit. My own conclusion is that their amendment simply spells death to the treaty.

Mr. President, complaint is made against the treaty agreement that Germany should make her renunciation in favor of Japan. The President, of course, naturally did not agree to that in the beginning and did not want to do it; the American delegates did not want to do it; but here was the situation: Great Britain had said to Japan, in the stress and heat of battle, "You take those rights from Germany and we shall not object to your holding them." France said the same thing to Japan; Italy said the same thing to her. Neither Great Britain, France, nor Italy was in any position to back up the United States in its contention that Japan should retain them. The United States was not strong enough to overrule the Japanese contention without the aid of the other great countries. And in the light—and I want the Senators to understand that—in the light of the agreement by Japan that she would return the German rights to China, and with the statement upon the part of the Japanese representatives that she would return them, the American delegates consented.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator said that England and France and Italy each said to Japan that if she would take these rights away from Germany they would let her retain them. Does the Senator know that that agreement made with Japan on the one side and England, France, and Italy on the other was made more than a year after Japan had taken those rights away from Germany in China?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was written up that long afterwards.

Mr. McCUMBER. My statement, Mr. President, must be taken together. I said in the beginning, before these questions were asked, that Great Britain, Italy, and France wanted Japan to remain in the war; they wanted her help; they wanted her influence. I do not know when the negotiation was first started; I do not know how long it was before it was reduced to writing there was an oral understanding; but I believe that when Japan went into this war to perform her part in taking possession of these territories under German control she had an understanding at that time, although it may not have been reduced to writing until afterwards. I agree with the Senator, however, that it was not reduced to writing and agreed to until after Japan had virtually secured control of the territory.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator if he will not agree to this statement—which I believe is correct—that the negotiations themselves show on their face that there was not any such understanding; that the German rights in China were not negotiated for by Japan, or anything done along that line, until the year 1917, commencing in January of that year?

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, about in January, 1917, Great Britain and France and Italy needed Japan mighty badly.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true; but Japan had taken the German possessions in 1914.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. So that the promise that she had from England, France, and Italy that she could keep them could not have been, as the Senator first stated, an inducement to Japan to take them when she did take them, for she took them before the promise was made?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, Mr. President; she took them before the written promise was made.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator any evidence of any other promise?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know when the negotiations began; I do not claim to know when they began; but from what I know of the situation I believe there was a tacit understanding of what the result would be from the very beginning.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. Would the Senator find any element worthy of discussion in the fact that after Japan had been bribed at the moment of the allies' dire need the shameful bargain was kept a secret from the United States, when two or three months later we were besought to speed up our warlike activities?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I know of no rule of national conduct, moral or legal or otherwise, that requires nations engaged in a war in which those nations have cobelligerents to publish to the world agreements made with such cobelligerents.

Mr. MOSES. No; not to the world, but to their cobelligerents.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, the United States was not in the war when the agreement was made.

Mr. MOSES. No, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Therefore, those nations were under no obligations to tell the United States what they had done.

Mr. MOSES. No, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. It will appear from the testimony before the committee, from questions asked by me, that there were no treaties entered into or any kind of agreements made after the United States entered into the war of which we were not fully cognizant.

Mr. MOSES. True; but the missions from all of our cobelligerents came here, sitting where you now sit, Mr. President, and addressed this body a few months after we entered the war, and yet never a word passed from their lips with reference to the horrid mess into which we were getting.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know of no reason why they should have told us even at that time about their own private agreements.

But I want Senators to remember as bearing upon the treaty and in justification of the action of the American delegates—and I do not care whether they were the best or the poorest; whether they were dictated to wholly by the President, or whether they exercised their own judgment—that at the time it was agreed that the renunciation might be made by Germany in favor of Japan it was well understood that Japan under her treaty was to return the territory to China. That is the principal matter that we ought to take into consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Referring to what the Senator has said about these other governments and Japan having this secret agreement, that it was no business of ours, and that they were under no obligation to tell us about it, for the sake of argument admitting that the Senator's position is right, I want to ask him if he does not think it was the duty of England and France and Italy at the time China went into the war to at least tell her that they had made a secret agreement by which they would carve her up when the war was over? Was it fair to China not to tell her that when she went into the war?

Mr. McCUMBER. If China had made the same agreement, I do not know that there was any obligation upon them to say that they had agreed to the same thing to which China had previously agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. China agreed to it before she went into the war.

Mr. McCUMBER. China agreed to it before she went into the war; China agreed to it before the others agreed to it. So I know of no particular obligation upon the part of the other powers to tell China that they had agreed to what China had previously agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator from North Dakota admits, first, that that pretended agreement was brought about by force, by coercion, and, second, that it was never approved by the Parliament of the Chinese Republic, which I will show under the constitution of China was necessary in order to make the treaty valid.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have so often responded to that question about duress that I feel that I ought not to reiterate what I have already said, but if it pleases the Senator to have me reiterate it, I will again say that similar rights to those obtained by Japan through that agreement were obtained by practically the same kind of duress by other nations. What Japan secured under that agreement was very little, indeed, and nothing more than was secured by other nations of the world. The principal thing that she insists upon is that, inasmuch as France and Germany and Great Britain and Italy and Belgium have obtained concessions of little strips of territory in which their nationals may reside, China will recognize that Japan has the same right and will give her like concessions.

I say that we are in no position to deny that to Japan. If we are in a position to deny it to Japan, then we ought to exclude both China and Japan from this proposed league as being inferior nations and unfit to be recognized as proper associates.

Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho justifies his belief as to what Japan will do by a declaration which he says was made by the speaker of the Japanese assembly, who declared that Japan is not bound to return the German concessions to China. Why did he say that? What was under discussion? What had been said throughout the world upon that subject? What had China herself done? China had said, "I refuse to sign this treaty, because it gives to Japan what I by my treaty gave to Japan." Therefore, China has broken her treaty; and, if that be true, the other party to the treaty necessarily would not be bound by it. Then what would be the right of Japan? Her only right would be the right of conquest. If she held the German possessions at all she would hold them free from her treaty obligations, and would hold them under the right which she had acquired by taking them from Germany. In that respect the statement made by this Japanese legislator was entirely correct.

It may be that there are members of the Japanese Legislature who believe and who intend, so far as they can govern the question, that Japan shall never release these possessions; but in the face of that is Japan's treaty. I want her held by her treaty; I want to put her in a position where she can not breach that treaty, where she will have no excuse on earth for breaking it. I want, then, to put her in a position where if she does attempt to break it she will have a united world against her.

The Senator says that Japan under the concessions can select any amount of territory. Mr. President, she can not do that in good faith. She could seize all of China, of course, if she desired to use force to seize it; but these concessions have come to have a well-defined meaning. They mean a tract of territory sufficient for the residences of the nationals of the grantee. That does not mean all of China or all of Asia; it means in the treaty with Japan exactly the same as a like character of concessions meant in the treaties with France, Great Britain, Italy, Belgium, and a half dozen other countries.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, the Senator will remember the testimony of Mr. Ferguson, in which he said that this reservation could not be a very large one, because it had to be taken out of the Kiaochow concession, which in itself was not very large.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; and it could not be very large for another reason. A mile square might answer the entire purpose or 3 square miles might be required, and even that, I think, would be excessive.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But outside of that the treaty itself says that it shall be taken out of this concession and not elsewhere in China.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have talked very much longer than I expected upon this subject. I am still convinced that the treaty provides the means by which Japan will be compelled to make good her word, if she does not do so without the force of the treaty. I want Japan to keep her word; I want China to be let alone hereafter; I want to protect her against aggression from the Caucasian nations as well as from her neighbor, Japan. I believe that can be accomplished in this way; I believe if we do not accomplish it in this way we will make matters a thousandfold worse for China. Therefore, Mr. President, I feel that we ought not to adopt the amendment to the treaty.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think I ought to avail myself of this occasion to put into the RECORD one of the sections of the Chinese constitution under which that Government existed at the time of the so-called treaty with Japan in 1915 and under which it still exists. Before I do so I want to say that, in my judgment—and I presume in the judgment of all who have given it any consideration—even that was immaterial, because it had been conceded, and is conceded all over the civilized world, that the treaty between Japan and China in 1915 was one of coercion, one of force, and that there was no moral binding obligation upon anyone to sustain it. We must remember that the treaty between Japan and China in 1915 was the culmination of the so-called 21 demands made by Japan upon China; we must remember that Japan availed herself of an opportunity to make those demands when, with the exception of the United States, nearly every great nation of the world was involved in war. Japan then made the demands upon China, a country with which she was at peace and one of the then neutral nations of the world, without any pretense of any disagreement or quarrel of any kind with China. Those demands came like a flash of lightning out of a clear sky, and China agreed to the treaty growing out of those demands because of an ultimatum issued by Japan and because of her knowledge that Japan already had many soldiers on Chinese soil and would put more there if China did not submit.

The President of the United States just recently, in a statement which he issued to the public, practically denounced this treaty of 1915, practically said that it was not considered at Paris, and he was so careful that the opportunity should not pass that he issued this statement upon the heels of the statement by the representative of the Japanese Government, in which reference was made to the treaty with China in 1915, and the President practically repudiated it. Everybody has repudiated it, so far as I know, until it has been defended here to-day.

But let us throw aside all this. Let us assume that it was honorable and honest. Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that there was not a step taken in negotiating it but that was on the square. What is the result, then? If all that be true, still that treaty is a nullity under the constitution of China. I do not believe that it would be entitled to the approval or sanction of any civilized Christian nation, even if it had been approved under coercion by their legislative body.

Does anybody contend that this treaty made with Germany, signed by the President, is legal and binding upon the United States? Does not everybody know that the Constitution of the United States provides that that treaty must be approved by the Senate? So does the constitution of the Republic of China, in the case of this kind of a treaty.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I wanted to ask the Senator, that being true, if Japan relinquishes voluntarily all except certain reserved rights, would not that action clear the claims of Japan down to that point, leaving the remaining alleged rights that Japan might claim to hold under the treaty of 1915 subject to controversy on the ground that even those alleged rights had no legal foundation, being based on duress and not having been ratified by the constitutional authority of China?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know that I understand the question of the Senator. I was interrupted when he first started to ask it and I did not hear it all.

Mr. OWEN. The question is this: If the treaty of 1915 has no legal foundation under the constitution of China, when Japan, under this proposed treaty with Germany, carrying out the promise made by the prime minister of Japan, relinquishes to China all except certain reserved rights, would not that clear up the question of everything except those reserved rights, and then would not those rights themselves be subject to challenge because not on a constitutional foundation?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think so. According to my idea, there was nothing conveyed by the treaty of 1915——

Mr. OWEN. I may agree to that without affecting the validity of the question.

Mr. NORRIS. Any more than if the Senator from Oklahoma walked down Pennsylvania Avenue and was held up by a thug and had his pocketbook taken away from him; no man would claim that that fact gave title to the money and to the pocketbook that was taken away from the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. Granting that that is true—and I agree with the Senator that that would be true—then if the thug gives back everything except a small part, and that small part is subsequently challenged by me before a court, is not that a better practical condition than to leave the thug with the whole thing?

Mr. NORRIS. No; we are not going to give the thug anything. The proper thing is to take the property away from the thug and give it to the rightful owner.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield for just a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. In the discussion of what has been stolen and what has not been stolen and its relative importance, Senators seem to have forgotten that the lease of the Manchurian Railroad, which was due to expire in 1923, if I remember correctly, was renewed for 99 years.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; there were a good many things that were etxended; of course, in my judgment, none of them legally. At least, I am not willing to put my official approval upon a theft or a robbery of that kind.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me get this constitutional provision in the RECORD. Senators may argue until doomsday, and even though all they contend for is right—that is, that the treaty for which the Senator from North Dakota contends, the treaty of 1915, was legal and binding—even though it had not been obtained by coercion or fraud or threat, it is still invalid, because it has not yet been approved by the Congress of China, as provided in the constitution. China is and was at that time a Republic, having then and now a written constitution, a Government that we and all the balance of the civilized world had recognized; and article 25 of the constitution of China reads as follows:

ART. 25. The President makes treaties, but should articles therein provide for any change of territory or increase the burdens of the citizens the concurrence of the legislature shall be required.

That is more explicit than our own Constitution. Hence, even though all that the Senator from North Dakota claims is correct just as he claims it, still that treaty is a nullity.

At the present time, Mr. President, I do not intend to go into detail—as I intend to do before this debate is over—in regard to the method in which that so-called treaty was brought about. It seems to me it is made sufficiently plain by their own argument. This is the first time that it has been defended, so far as I have heard, in the Senate or elsewhere, as being entitled to recognition by a Christian nation or people; but when they do they go right in the face of the constitution of China itself, which, in my humble judgment, throws their argument all to the ground and completely nullifies it.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I give notice that on Friday next, with the concurrence of the Senate, I wish to make some observations in relation to the treaty of Versailles.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] alluded to the alleged fact that Japan had these concessions in Shantung by right of the treaty of 1915. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has just shown that that treaty could not be binding without the consent of the Chinese Legislature. I wish to read a brief statement made by Dr. Ferguson, who was the advisor of the Chinese Government and of four of the Chinese Presidents, and is still the official advisor of the President of China, in relation to the character of the duress which was applied to China when she was compelled to sign this treaty of 1915 upon which all Japan's present claim rests. I read from page 559 of the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations on the treaty of peace with Germany, in part 11:

Senator BRANDEGEE. What was the character of the duress which Japan applied to China in order to get the concessions which she did get?

Mr. FERGUSON. She had her force which she had sent for the capture of Kiaochow still in the Province of Shantung, and scattered along the railway northward to Lung Kow——

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you know how large that force was?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes. May I finish my answer, and then I will explain?

Senator BRANDEGEE. I beg your pardon, certainly.

Then Mr. Ferguson says, describing how far Japan had extended its authority over the Province of Shantung:

Mr. FERGUSON. Northward to Lung Kow, westward to Tsi-nan Fu, the capital of Shantung Province, and eastward to Tsingtau. That force was officially stated to be somewhere between 50,000 and 60,000 men.

Mind you, these were veteran Japanese troops, who had just driven the Germans out of Kiaochow.

Japan sent her troops to replace either all those or a portion of those which she had already sent as her expeditionary force against Kiaochow. She had already sent forces, but replaced them when these demands were being made there, so that the force which she had at that time must have been somewhere between 60,000 and 70,000 men in various parts of the Province. She did not take away the original forces that she had sent new forces to replace, but left them all there until China had consented to her ultimatum. Furthermore, she assembled her fleet at Sasebo, her naval base, which is almost directly east and about 20 hours' steaming from Kiaochow on the coast of Japan; and she had sent word through her consular officers asking all Japanese to come from interior places and report at coast towns. In my experience, outside of the Boxer year 1900, when all nations sent forces to China, there has never been anything like the size or the threatening attitude of the forces of any nation such as Japan used in obtaining this concession from China.

Senator KNOX. What period of time did the ultimatum prescribe?

Mr. FERGUSON. It was given to the Chinese Government on May 7, shortly after noon, and May 9, at 6 o'clock, an answer was demanded.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you think that China would have granted the concession to Japan in the absence of this military demonstration?

Mr. FERGUSON. No, sir; it caused the resignation of the minister of foreign affairs, who had made the negotiations, and a new man was appointed, Mr. Lu-Cheng-Tsiang, who afterwards was sent as the head of the Chinese commission to the Paris conference, the Chinese Government fearing that this very question would arise, and showing by the appointment of the same man as the head of the Chinese delegation who had signed those treaties under duress her sincerity in the position which she has consistently maintained that the treaty was signed under duress. I understand from the Chinese delegation—I was not present at Paris myself and only speak from the report to me directly by a member of the Chinese delegation who was there—Mr. Lu made that statement also to the Paris conference, that he signed the treaty of May 25, 1915, under protest.

May I state also, Senator, that in the official statement given out by the Chinese Government after the conclusion of the negotiations and the signature of the treaty that fact is also mentioned?

So that that treaty between Japan and China in 1915 was extorted by duress, in the presence of the largest Japanese army that had ever been in China in time of peace, together with the concentration of the Japanese fleet to act in cooperation with it, from a nation who were given from the afternoon of May 7 to 6 o'clock on May 9 to decide whether they would have war made against them by the Japanese Army and the Japanese fleet, they being entirely powerless to defend themselves, or whether they would yield up an integral part of their territory; and there was nothing for them to do but to succumb.

Dr. Ferguson further testified, as the official advisor of the Chinese Government, that it had to be and had been the policy of the Chinese Government, powerless to defend itself, after making all the protests and arguing for the right as best they could, to give these concessions to such nations as made sufficient demonstration, relying all the time upon the hope that some day these outside powers which were invading China's sovereignty would quarrel among themselves, and then that China could array one set of her despoilers against the other, and possibly reinstate her own territories within her own government; but he says the iniquity of this treaty is that it destroys the last hope of China. No longer can these powers be hoped to fall apart, and, in the conflicting interests of each other, finally to do justice to China. Under this league and this treaty they all guarantee that this wrong shall be forever perpetuated, and they all consecrate it and lend it their countenance, and agree to maintain the status quo, and therefore any glimmering hope that China ever had that she might obtain justice through the lack of counsels of her enemies is gone forever; and these people who are purporting to found a league to perpetuate peace to see international justice and morality among the nations, as described in the preamble of this treaty, present to the world the spectacle of first falling in unison upon the weakest member of the league and despoiling it ruthlessly, as an example to the world of how they will administer justice and equity provided this unholy alliance is consummated by the ratification and approval of this treaty by the great Senate of the United States.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, in commenting upon the Shantung matter a few moments ago I spoke of the advantageous effect to China of the treaty in its present form when the title passes from Germany to Japan, and Japan carries out the agreement which she made with the nations of the world to return Shantung with certain small property reservations. Even in that contingency, China, having become possessed of everything except the reserved property rights, would be in a position to challenge the title of Japan even to those reserved property rights on the ground that Japan had no right to enforce the so-called treaty of 1915 upon China by which they had any reserved rights in Shantung. So in the long run it would seem to be more advantageous for China than otherwise. Moreover, China would be in a position with the league of nations established to plead the duress which has been charged against Japan and to have set aside any rights that might be claimed by Japan under a treaty so obtained, and which was not approved by the constitutional authorities of China. The Senator from Nebraska says we will not give Japan anything by this treaty, but will take Shantung from Japan. We are in no position to give China Shantung, nor can we go to war to take it from Japan. The Senator is surely not advocating war as a preferable alternative. Japan has Shantung. The German treaty provides a means of its retransfer to China, all except small property reservation and the land for a Japanese town, such as at Hongkong and Shanghai, and so forth.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I ask the Senator, would not that be asking China to appeal to the very powers that perpetrated the outrage to undo it?

Mr. OWEN. I deny that the powers have perpetrated an outrage.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator may describe it in such euphuistic language as he may, but would it not be appealing to the very powers that are now consummating the thing to be appealed against?

Mr. OWEN. It would be appealing to the organized, decent opinion of mankind through the league of nations, established, among other things, to hear such questions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If it is not decent now, why would it be decent after the league is formed?

Mr. OWEN. The organized opinion of mankind is altogether decent now, notwithstanding the unwarranted slur of the Senator from Connecticut.

The reason why we have hoped that the organized opinion of mankind would have some force under the league is that the league is composed of all the free nations of the world, a condition that could not exist until this war was terminated and the military autocracies overthrown. It has been a strange thing to me to see Senators who were in favor of a league when the members of the league would be monarchies and military autocracies opposing a league which is now to be composed only of free nations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Are they not now free when they are turning over part of a great republic to an autocratic, oriental government; and, if they are free now, why will they be freer after the league is formed when they will have to do it by unanimous consent?

Mr. OWEN. The meaning of the term "a free nation" is where the people have control of the governing powers and where the consent of the governed is the controlling force and where the sovereignty is vested in the people.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But, Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. The Senator must allow me to reply without interruption until I get through with my reply, and then I will listen to and answer any other question if I can do so. A league of free nations of the world is a means by which the organized opinion of mankind can be invoked. It will afford a forum to China to which she can appeal against any injustice perpetrated upon her by duress. If there is no league, if Senators break down the proposed league and prevent it, then there is no place where the organized, decent opinion of mankind can make itself effective, and China will have no recourse except war if her diplomacy fails.

I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, the Senator knows that such an appeal by China to the league of nations would require the unanimous action of them all. They can not do anything except by unanimous consent, we are told. Furthermore, it would be an appeal to the very people who perpetrated it to undo the very thing they have sanctioned. Great Britain, France, and the United States are just as free now, and, in my opinion, much more so than they will be after the supergovernment of the league is saddled upon them.

But the question here is, Will this great free Nation, now being free to act for itself and by itself according to its own conscience, be as representative of American freedom and American liberty when it lends the sanction of its ratification to what I regard as an outrage? Will it confirm as a part of this treaty the granting of loot to the country which has exacted tribute from China by force of arms?

Mr. OWEN. I should be better satisfied if the Senator would not be on both sides of the same question. What I mean by that is, that the Senator says no action can be taken by the league of nations because it requires unanimous consent——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not. I said no action could be taken without unanimous consent or except by unanimous consent.

Mr. OWEN. He said no action could be taken except by unanimous consent, and therefore there would be no forum in which——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I did not say there would be no forum. I said it would be very difficult to get the unanimous consent of all the parties who had decided the other way when they were individually free to act.

Mr. OWEN. The effect of what the Senator says is that there can be no action by the league of nations because it requires unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I say it will be exceedingly difficult; and everybody knows, I trust, who has the privilege of voting or who can read in this country, that it is not wise to appeal to a tribunal as a disinterested tribunal which is composed of the very members who have perpetrated the crime against which you are protesting.

Mr. OWEN. It requires unanimous consent for action, according to the Senator, and yet the Senator has argued that this same league would have the power to send American soldiers, without the consent of Congress, to the ends of the earth.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not said a word on that subject.

Mr. OWEN. I used the Senator as an illustration of those of his colleagues whom he supports who are so contending, because he, in effect, is with them in making that argument.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to be responsible for what other Senators may say.

Mr. OWEN. I am pleased to see the Senator unwilling to be responsible for what his leader, Mr. LODGE, strenuously urged on August 12 in his carefully prepared address.

Mr. LODGE made this argument: "That the league could send American soldiers where it pleased," and now the distinguished Senator from Connecticut argues that the league is powerless to right a wrong of any kind because paralyzed by the requirement of a unanimous vote.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. One of the great free nations of the earth with whom we are to be associated, and of which the Senator is such an admirer, is this nation of Japan, is it not?

Mr. OWEN. I greatly admire Japan.

Mr. FALL. Do you mean to say that Japan is a free Government, a representative Government?

Mr. OWEN. I will say that Japan has made more progress in the direction of establishing free government——

Mr. FALL. That is not the question.

Mr. OWEN. Than any other nation in the world in the same length of time.

Mr. FALL. I have heard the Senator too often not to know the workings of his mind. He knows perfectly well that he is not answering my question.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator would argue that because Japan has a monarchial government therefore Japan is not a free nation.

Mr. FALL. Oh, no; not necessarily. I think Great Britain has a monarchial government and I think Great Britain is a free nation. The Senator knows perfectly well what I have in mind.

Mr. OWEN. I know very well the people of Japan had no hesitation in going to the gates of their foreign office and demanding the action which they desired, and I regard that as fairly an evidence that they are not altogether without some voice.

Mr. FALL. Those who needed bread knocked at the gates of Versailles, too, and knocked them down.

Mr. OWEN. I think that is what the people of Japan will do if they do not have liberty.

Mr. FALL. Ah, but the people of Japan have not done it yet.

Mr. OWEN. They are in a mood in which it can easily be done and they have the intelligence to do it if they are denied liberty.

Mr. FALL. Does the Senator mean for a moment to say that Japan has a free elective Parliament?

Mr. OWEN. I mean to say that Japan has a Parliament which by its nature represents proportionally and fairly the elements of Japan.

Mr. FALL. How is the upper house selected?

Mr. OWEN. The upper house represents the old samurai and nobility.

Mr. FALL. Named by whom?

Mr. OWEN. They are named, I assume, by the existing old order.

Mr. FALL. By the Mikado, in other words?

Mr. OWEN. Not by the Mikado, but by the little group that surrounds the Mikado.

Mr. FALL. By the Mikado under the constitution of Japan, the upper house, which has a veto on all legislation, and a lower house elected how?

Mr. OWEN. I think the lower house is fairly representative of Japan?

Mr. FALL. Elected by restricted suffrage. Do you mean to say that everyone in Japan has a vote?

Mr. OWEN. No; I do not.

Mr. FALL. I thought the Senator understood my question.

Mr. OWEN. I understand the Senator's question well enough, and I will say to the Senator that Japan having made a union with Great Britain, Japan having stood with the Republic of France and with Belgium and with Italy and with the United States in this Great War for liberty and civilization, is entitled to the respect of the world, and particularly of this great Republic, and ought not to be insulted on this floor.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from New Mexico certainly can not be accused of insulting Japan. He has not said anything about Japan.

Mr. OWEN. I have reference to what took place on this floor this afternoon, where Japan was being held responsible for the breathings and the ambitions of the Order of the Black Dragon, the same kind of an order which existed in degree as the Order of the Black Eagle in Germany—the military order, the order that ruled in terms of force and brute military power alone, the order that would, if it had its way, organize mankind for battle and lead them to the shambles. But that order does not control Japan now and that order is decadent. That order is being rapidly and practically eliminated from the forces governing mankind, and the Senator need not be any more afraid of the Order of the Black Dragon than of the Order of the Black Eagle.

Mr. FALL. We have just had something to do with the Order of the Black Eagle.

Mr. OWEN. I think we have had something to do with the Black Eagle, and the Black Dragon will go the same path if it throws itself in the path of the liberty and happiness of mankind.

Mr. FALL. I am curious to know the idea the Senator entertains of Italy. Does the Senator understand Italy has a government such as that under which we live?

Mr. OWEN. I have a very interesting statement from the premier of Italy—Signor Nitti—stating in flat terms that the people of Italy are as democratic as the people of America.

Mr. FALL. I have a very interesting copy of the constitution of Italy, and I presume the Senator has it.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, yes. Constitutions do not always describe aptly the people.

Mr. FALL. Oh, no.

Mr. OWEN. People outgrow constitutions.

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. People burst the bounds of constitutions when they no longer fit, and Italy is making great progress in that direction, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I have not reflected upon the Italian people or the Italian Government any more than upon the Japanese people and the Japanese Government. I am asking the Senator, who is talking about our associates, the great free people of the earth——

Mr. OWEN. I regard the Italian people as a very great free people.

Mr. FALL. A great free people of the earth, and still their upper house is not elected, and it has the veto power upon anything which may be done by the lower house.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; and I will say to the Senator that until recently this Chamber was in a position where one Member could veto the whole Senate by unlimited debate, by talking anything to death that he saw fit to.

Mr. FALL. He can do it yet, I presume.

Mr. OWEN. He ought not to be permitted to do it. We should have the previous question or perfected cloture.

Mr. FALL. So far as the rules are concerned, the Senate has rejected the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma along the line of limiting debate.

Mr. OWEN. They have adopted limited cloture but ought to adopt absolute cloture. They will show better manners, better ability, and greater patriotism when they adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma in this matter, as they did on the direct election of Senators.

Mr. FALL. Of course, like the eleventh man on the jury, the others are always wrong. However, the other fellows have the vote as yet.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will yield for a moment to enable me to make a brief statement, I had expected to reply to some of the observations of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I shall avail myself of the earliest opportunity after the close of the morning business to-morrow to address myself to some of the matters which he took up, and also to some of the matters apparently now being considered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the favorable balance of trade for July of the United States fell off $400,000,000 from what it was last June, and the Senate sits talking all day and doing nothing to protect the foreign commerce of this country. I appeal to the Senate to give that matter attention for some of the hours of the day at least. I want to call the attention of the Senate to one or two matters affecting that question. I have in my hand a statement from the premier of Italy, showing that Italy is abundantly able to meet all its obligations, and that he is taking the steps to put her credit on the same high plane it reached before the war, where its bonds were above par. Premier Nitti says:

"Italy needs to cut the use of red tape. Italy is poor at present, but not so poor as people abroad seem to think. The trouble lies chiefly in the secret we have made of our difficulties.

"The people of Italy have been told that the war has been won for no advantage because, owing to diplomatic and economic reasons, all her aspirations can not be materialized. It is the greatest mistake imaginable.

"Italy has won the war and won it to very great and distinct advantage. We have now a solid frontier, almost impregnable. We are rid of the Austrian yoke which was weighing heavily on our shoulders and preventing expansion.

CITES ITALY'S RESOURCES.

"We are now free to work for our greater program, which is one of economical and political enlargement.

"Europe will soon realize that Italy is at present the strongest nucleus of the European Continent. France, whose territory is two-fifths larger than ours, has a smaller population than Italy. And while we are to-day nearly 40,000,000, we shall exceed 50,000,000 in less than 10 years.

"We possess a greater number of men able to work than any other country. This is more than gold. It is power. And by power I mean power to carry on a program of civilization and progress. We do not want any other war. We want to be on friendly terms with all nations.

"The present misunderstandings, originated at the peace conference, will soon be smoothed over. Italy is the natural friend of the United States and the natural friend of France.

"The United States will need labor in future because of America's wonderful resources. Italy has got labor, good labor.

"This labor must not go to the American market and slump it with offers of cheap wages. Your American workingman has the right to protect himself and therefore the right to protect his labor market according to the standard of prices he has earned and set up as a result of the war.

HIGH TAX ON CAPITAL.

"Our workingman must submit to the same rule and not try to outbid his native colleague. The same applies to France. Our nearness, our Latin blood, our community of interests make the two countries bound to become more and more closely friendly.

"It is a vast program of work and of reconstruction which lies before us. Italy is grappling with it in great style. Economically we were sound. We have only $18,000,000,000 national debt, of which $4,000,000,000 is with foreign countries, chiefly America."

I pause to say that the $14,000,000,000 of bonded debt which Italy has is owned by its own citizens and is therefore to be regarded as a private asset while a national debit and does not impair the productive power of Italy or reduce the gross value of its property.

The premier goes on to say, in speaking of this debt:

"I am going to reduce it at once at least between four and five billions by enforcing a high taxation on capital, especially on capital recently earned through the war.

"Then I am going to apply a heavy tax on incomes. That will give us enough to face the interest and charges on a new loan. The Italian people will pay. And in no time you will see our securities increase their value.

"We have little food and practically no coal. Well, we shall find a way out of even this tight corner. I am positive that Italy has come out of the war in far better condition than many other allied countries."

The potential water powers of Italy will produce enough electricity to furnish all the light, heat, and power needed in all Italy—or in Europe for that matter—to electrify the railroads, furnish all the factories and homes and municipalities of Italy with heat and light and power.

He goes on to speak of the new democracy in Italy, and I respectfully call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to what he says:

THE NEW DEMOCRACY.

"We shall soon rebound. Our natural resources are going to be exploited to the utmost, and the latest American methods are going to be applied.

"The American people will be the first ones to understand my meaning, because it is in their blood to go to the root of any problem and to dispose of it quickly in the best possible way. We do not intend to run after any chimeric, imperialistic vision.

"The whole problem to-day reduces itself to a question of letting the people of our countries know each other better than in the past. Italy is as democratic as America, and from now on the people themselves will have a greater share in the government of the country. A new era is dawning over the world. The future belongs to the new democracy, founded on work."

I have the greatest confidence in Italy, and I am in favor of giving a generous hand to Italy until she can recover the shock of the Great War.

To help Italy is to help ourselves. Italy demonstrated during this war qualities of the very highest nobility and placed the whole world under everlasting obligations.

Why should we not extend credit to industrious, thrifty, faithful Italy?

It is a shame to sell them dollars at 85 per cent premium because of their sudden great need. To take advantage of a friend's necessity is base indeed.

Mr. President, when the Italians buy anything from the United States they have to pay for it in dollars. When they buy dollars in terms of lire they pay 85 per cent bonus for the temporary credit required for them to make their purchases in the United States. The Italians can not stand and no other people can stand any such charge as that. Great Britain understands that perfectly well. There is in the Annalist an item of yesterday which I wish to call to the attention of the Senate to the following effect:

BRITISH CREDIT TO ITALY.

"Great Britain is making every effort to keep abreast of the United States in the fight for foreign trade. In its program of peaceful penetration of Italy it is announced that the British treasury will now permit three renewals of 90-day bills granted in payment for British merchandise bought for export to Italy; in other words, one year's credit.

"'British business,' says the American Chamber of Commerce, 'looks upon this decision as of the greatest importance at the present time, when United States traders are offering Italian buyers special inducements to purchase American goods.'"

What special inducements of United States traders can overcome a premium of 85 per cent bonus on the sale of dollars?

I notice in the press a statement that I had suggested Italy pledge her customs for credit. I did nothing of the kind and would oppose such a suggestion.

Italy has no need whatever to do anything of the kind, and I resent the false suggestion attributed to me.

So long as we furnished credit through the Treasury of the United States to these foreign countries, of course they were able to buy American goods for their uses, but when national credit is cut off they must rely upon the banks and private investors.

An editorial which the New York Times published on Sunday rather disclaimed the idea that the bankers were speculating in exchange. There is no financial reason why bankers should not speculate in exchange. They handle it as commodities. It is no accusation of private demerit on their part that they are speculating in exchange. They buy and sell exchange as they would buy commodities of any kind. They are simply commercial men engaged in such transactions. They have no public or political duty in the premises under our system.

Moreover, there are wide differences among bankers. Some bankers do not and would not speculate in foreign exchange any more than they would speculate in the stock market. There are others who feel justified in doing both.

There is a statement in the Bulletin, of Philadelphia, which calls attention to this matter and which I will submit for the RECORD without reading:

"On previous occasions of this kind these bankrupt reactions in exchange have meant that the course of depreciation was checked for a longer or shorter period, but with rates left to fluctuate around a distinctly lower general level than before. The reason for such changes in the market from after each decline in rates lies first in the fact that a good part of the accumulated bills which had been overhanging the market will have been sold and disposed of, and, second, that the speculators in exchange who had sold in connection with that legitimate trade movement had made enough to cover their speculative commitments when the real liquidation ceases."

The only corrective for this matter, Mr. President, is the furnishing of credit to the buyers of Europe on long time, and that can not be done by the banks. The banks have a limit to their capacity. It must be done by the American investing public through a mechanism provided for that purpose, or it must be done by the Government either directly or indirectly. These credits are partly of a political nature and ought not to be treated as purely a commercial transaction, for the reason that the conditions temporarily created by war are such that the ordinary banking system does not furnish the credits which are required in so large a quantity for the rehabilitation of Europe.

Moreover, as a people we have extended to Europe credit amounting to $10,000,000,000. In order to safeguard those credits, to put the people of Europe in a position where they can more promptly repay, there ought to be extended the credit necessary to furnish them with machinery and raw materials, so that their labor can be made productive, and they can pay us back in the only way any people can ultimately pay any other people, and that is in the terms of their labor transmuted into commodities and into manufactured goods.

I again call the attention of the Senate to this matter. I have taken the time of the Senate for these few moments in order to impress upon the Senate the fact that our favorable balance of trade fell off $400,000,000 in July.

I was to-day advised by a most responsible authority that New York Harbor was full of loaded ships held up for lack of financing their cargoes intended for Europe.

What is the matter with Congress and with the administration that these conditions excite no remedy whatever?

Where is the managing director, Eugene Myers, of the War Finance Corporation? Where is the Federal Reserve Board?

The initiative in this matter is on the majority that controls this body, and I call their attention to it once more in the hope that some action may be taken.

The exchange rates being in the hands of a few are subject peculiarly to manipulation, and this is accomplished, in part, by short selling and arbitrary fixing of prices at which dollars are sold to those compelled to have dollars for American purchases.

If short selling and speculation and manipulation are persisted in in foreign exchange, a drastic investigation should be made of the whole matter, its causes, its chief agents, and its effects, and I shall feel it my duty to demand it. This injurious condition must be stopped if our national commerce is to prosper.

I have been asked what "short selling" means. The short selling of exchange means selling sterling, franc, and lire credits for future delivery with the expectation of getting the credits before the time of delivery at a lower price.

For example, on the hypothesis of active business to be transacted, an American importer wishes to import $1,000,000 of French goods and needs French credits on November 1. A foreign exchange bank, having no French credits available, sells him 8,000,000 francs deliverable November 1, 1919, for $1,000,000. The bank sells what it has not, expecting that the French need for dollars to buy American cotton, and so forth, in the fall will be so great it can then, by the sale of the dollars the French severely need in October, buy the franc credits—a French exchange—at a still lower rate and make a profit.

In the hypothetical case the importer, or a pure speculator for that matter, is betting exchange will be higher and the bank is betting it will be lower. The banker knows the crops mature in the fall, that our agricultural crops must largely go to market, and therefore there will be a larger demand for dollars by foreign buyers, who must arrange exchange of foreign credits for American credits by selling sterling, francs, and so forth, for dollars. Moreover, the banker knows that he and a dozen others like him have the monopoly of these transactions—buying and selling foreign exchange. If he sells francs at 6 and buys at 7 he makes a million francs on every $1,000,000 handled. If he buys at 7 and exchange comes back to par—5.18—he makes 3,000,000 francs on every $1,000,000 handled. Investors are now doing this. As our foreign exchange goes into the hundreds of millions of dollars, the temptation to gamble in foreign exchange is great. It is like the temptation of a dealer in roulette, who can measurably control his wheel.

When the bankers sell exchange short it is to their interest to make exchange go lower, and they can accomplish this result by arbitrarily refusing to sell dollar credits except at a lower price, and NO POWER EXISTS TO PREVENT IT, as they have a monopoly.

I think it is against the interest of our commerce to speculate in exchange by short selling it. We injure our commerce when we tax England 15 per cent, France 55 per cent, and Italy 85 per cent premium on sale of dollar credits. No one doubts that Italy, France, and Great Britain will soon react and be on a live gold basis, and if they agree to pay us back in dollars they ought to get credit at a fair rate.

We ought not to take advantage of the very transitory conditions to overcharge them for credit. We ought to require good security and give fair rates and for a term sufficient to enable convenient repayment. The banks handling foreign exchange have not funds sufficient to fully cover this field. It requires either the investing public or the Government itself. I think both should cooperate under the bills now pending. The importers and exporters are disappointed, if not disgusted, with the fatal apathy of Congress.

The injury which will result to our producers will react on Congress in due time.

The delay in establishing peace leaves the national credit of newborn nations in a sad plight because of the doubt as to their stability which is thus left in the minds of American banks and investors.

Whatever is needed in legislation is needed NOW, and I appeal to the leaders of the majority party in this Chamber to act.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to refer for just a moment to the remarks which have been made by the Senator from Oklahoma.

We are told that we must at an early date secure action upon the peace treaty, for the reason that if we do not do so our exportations and our business with foreign countries will decrease. I desire to say at this time that America can not keep up the amount of her exportations, such as those of last month or of months previous, unless there is an entire change in the commerce of the world. England herself can not purchase the goods that she has been purchasing in America unless we ourselves import more goods from England. There are only two ways, in my opinion, in which this change can be brought about. One is that America must buy more goods from foreign countries, in order that the balance of trade may be equalized, for these countries can not pay America the balance of trade to-day caused by the great amount of exportations and the small amount of importations unless America advances credit to those nations. If the exportations from this country to foreign countries continue as large as they have been in the past year or two, and our importations are no more than they have been during those years, even our country can not extend the necessary credit.

We must remember that we have a great deal of uncovered paper in this country, or, in other words, inflation of currency, and when we stop to think that there are $56,000,000,000 of such paper in the world we will at once realize that there is a limit even to our own country issuing more paper money.

Mr. President, I recognize the fact that the bills which the Senator from Oklahoma has introduced, and which are now pending before the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, will, in a small degree, relieve the situation, but they will afford only temporary relief. The only way that America can afford even a halfway relief is for every American citizen, rich or poor, to begin from this time on to economize and save. Not only do I call upon every American citizen to do so, but I desire to say that the Government of the United States must begin to save money if we are to assist in relieving the financial conditions in the world as they exist to-day.

I expect in a little while, shortly after the pending bill shall have been passed, to address the Senate upon the question of the high cost of government. I give notice now of my intention to do so in connection with the statement—for we must begin early a national program for saving. We may talk all we desire to about the high cost of living, and of the high cost of every class of produce and goods in the United States, and we can pass all the laws of which we can conceive or suggest, but so long as the inflation of currency in the world is so great as it is to-day, mounting higher and higher, there will be no way to make very much change in present prices. Until this condition is modified in the world, no remedy which we may attempt will be a complete remedy. I shall not, however, consume any more time upon this subject this evening.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I present a number of amendments to the pending oil-leasing bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senate has now been in session 6 hours and 25 minutes for the consideration of the oil-leasing bill, and up to the present time I think this is the first reference that has been made to the bill. So I think I had better keep that record straight for the day and not ask for the consideration of amendments to the bill or of the bill itself at this late hour.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] has requested me to report back favorably from the Committee on Commerce, with an amendment, the bill (S. 2883) authorizing the Meridian Highway Bridge Co., a corporation, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges and approaches thereto across the Missouri River between Yankton County, S. Dak., and Cedar County, Nebr. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment was, in line 7, after the word "point," to insert "or points," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Meridian Highway Bridge Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of South Dakota, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge or bridges and approaches thereto across the Missouri River at a point or points suitable to the interest of navigation, in section 18, township 93, range 55 west, or section 13, township 93, range 56 west, Yankton County, S. Dak., to the shore opposite thereto at a point in sections 11 or 12, township 33 north, range 1 west, Cedar County, Nebr., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 27, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 26, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, late chaplain of the Second Division, American forces in Germany, offered the following prayer:

Dear Lord, lay upon the heart of each the sense of responsibility to do his best, and give us all the thrill and power, that issue from thankfulness to and trust in Thee, to attempt, to achieve, and to aspire. Above all party names and obsolete slogans, all outgrown denominational shibboleths and narrowing dogmas, may we as a people, and particularly these Representatives gathered here this morning, work for the liberation of men from all unauthorized bondage and for the vision of the kingdom of heaven in the eye of the soul. In these days of newly re-established peace amongst nations and yet of great social unrest be Thou the force and director of the powers of the social and international mechanism. Especially we ask this in our own land, because we feel that if America goes aright there is hope for the world, but if America goes wrong the whole world will be awry. Give us, therefore, we pray, light and leading in the way and will of Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RETIREMENT OF SCHOOL-TEACHERS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business to-day is the bill H. R. 5818, the teachers' retirement bill for the District of Columbia, on which the previous question was ordered. The question before the House is the motion to recommit, offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. As many as are in favor of the motion to recommit——

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, on that I think we ought to have the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma demands the yeas and nays.

The question was taken, and 35 Members rose.

The SPEAKER. Not a sufficient number.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The SPEAKER. There is no other side. The question is whether one-fifth of the Members present demand the yeas and nays. Two hundred and eighty-five Members voted a moment ago. Thirty-five is not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUBEY and Mr. BLANTON) there were 159 ayes and 73 noes.

Mr. RUBEY and Mr. BLANTON made the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-three Members present, a quorum.

Mr. ALMON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALMON. Would it not be in order to now make a demand for the yeas and nays on the bill? There is such a wide difference of opinion. I am opposed to the bill and would like to go on record.

The SPEAKER. That request was made once and refused.

Mr. ALMON. I make it again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not make it again. The ayes are 159 and the noes 53, and the bill is passed.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on laying the motion on the table.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 184 ayes and 4 noes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that he must count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-three Members present, a quorum, and the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table is carried.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the measure just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the measure just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TARIFF ON PEARL BUTTONS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7705) to amend section 339 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, in respect to the tariff on buttons of shell and pearl; and pending that I ask unanimous consent that one half of the time in general debate be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the other half by myself, and that we run along without fixing the time until later on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7705, and pending that asks unanimous consent that the control of one-half of the time for general debate be by himself and one-half by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. Is there objection?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Reserving the right to object, I would like to get an understanding of the situation. I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan in reference to the plan. As I understand it, the debate to begin with will not in all probability be in relation to the bill, but subsequently, when we get through with the extraneous remarks, he will move to rise and have the time fixed and debate confined to the bill itself.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I ask this in order that Members may know what is going to come, and I understand it is agreeable to the other side.

Mr. KITCHIN. That will be all right; we will run along until these gentlemen who have asked for time get through with their remarks.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And after that we will confine the debate to the bill itself?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and agree on the time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. FORDNEY was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FESS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7705) to amend section 339 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, in respect to the tariff on buttons of shell and pearl.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

THE MONDELL SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BILL.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I feel like apologizing to the House for discussing a matter not related to the bill before the House, and particularly a matter on which the House may not be called upon to vote for some little time, for a few days at least.

My excuse for doing so is that the question I desire to discuss is, in my opinion, a tremendously important one, one that must be met, and I am afraid that in our very great interest in other matters, the necessity of giving attention to the legislation directly before the House and the committees of the House, Members have not given this matter much consideration. I ask your indulgence while I discuss for a few moments the purposes and provisions of H. R. 487, the soldier settlement bill.

From the time of the signing of the armistice and before thoughtful men have been considering the problems of reconstruction and restoration—problems related to the hoped-for return to normal conditions; problems the solution of which shall start the Nation on that long road of peaceful progress and prosperity which we hope lies before us. And as we have thought of these things our minds have naturally turned to the question of what could be done and what ought to be done to insure for the returning soldier conditions of opportunity such as men who have offered their lives to their country are entitled to have.

Of course, no one who has given serious thought to these things has done so on the theory that it would be necessary to create or provide by legislative action such opportunities for all of the millions of men who entered their country's service. It would be a sad commentary on the Republic indeed if that were true. The resources, industries, and institutions of the country, for which these gallant men served and fought, afford and provide the most wonderful opportunities that men have ever enjoyed, and, speaking generally, the soldier of the Great War who returned uninjured and unimpaired in health asks nothing of his country save that whole-hearted appreciation of his service and sacrifice, which is assured him, and an opportunity to prove himself in a fair field.

A very great majority of our soldiers of the Great War will return home to continue the pursuits, plans, and purposes of the days before their Army service. Many will find their opportunities in the growing and expanding interests and industries of the section of the country from which they came. Others will seek entirely new fields and pursuits and will find their opportunities in town or country, in the section of the Union that may attract their adventurous footsteps. In short, the great body of the returning soldiers will, barring some national visitation of business stagnation or financial panic, which is wholly unlikely, find abundant opportunities awaiting them.

While all this is true, it is also true that in the plans of thoughtful men touching the future there has been constantly the thought that notwithstanding the limitless opportunities which a country like ours affords and will afford to the stout hearts, willing hands, and enthusiastic spirits of the returning soldier, it was incumbent upon the country as a measure and a token of appreciation, and out of abundance of caution in provision, to afford certain opportunities other and beyond those which the country now affords, and which would be available to such of the returning soldiers as might need employment or have some difficulty in finding opportunities to their liking.

It would be an awful indictment of the Republic for which these men fought should they return home to a condition of things which would necessitate the inauguration of special governmental activities, or legislative provisions for especial opportunities, other than those which the country affords for the great majority, or any very considerable portion of these, the most efficient, energetic, and capable of our citizens. But it is not only a mark of appreciation, but a measure warranted by our peculiar regard for the returning soldier, that certain opportunities should be afforded, other than those which now exist, to such of them as for various reasons desire to avail themselves of such opportunities.

It is entirely logical and natural that the thoughts of those who have studied and considered these things should have turned to the soil—to Mother Earth—to these enterprises and occupations which constitute the most natural and the sanest of all human activities, as well as those most essential to the maintenance of human life and the perpetuity of human institutions in their best form.

Furthermore, it is peculiarly in harmony with our experience as a people to think of opportunities based on the soil and its fertility in connection with our appreciation of, care, and regard for our fighting men, for all of our wars have been followed by periods of liberal land legislation and remarkable and unusual land development.

The glorious victories of the sword have been followed by the blessed victories of peaceful land conquest and home building. The men of the armies of the Revolution and of the War of 1812 poured over the barriers of the Alleghenies to find homes on the headwaters of the rivers that seek the Gulf of Mexico, and the soldiers of the Civil War carried the conquest to the farthest confines of the territory drained by the Father of Waters and to the lands of the western slope. It is true that only a comparatively small precentage of the soldiers of these wars tried their fortunes on the new lands; nevertheless the total was large and the soldier who left the old home to try his chances abroad left a better opportunity for those who remained, and the one man out of a score in shop or factory who sought these opportunities on the land reduced the competition and improved the opportunities of those who remained.

But the boundless opportunities for new land conquests and for new farm home building of those other days no longer exist. It is true that in several of the Western States free lands are to be found which, while they are not as fertile or well watered as the lands of the Mississippi Valley, still afford opportunities for those who desire to engage in the class of stock-raising farming to which these lands are adapted. It is also true that there are still some sections of the country where lands are available and within reach of those of limited means and of strong faith and earnest purpose.

As we survey the field, however, we are reminded of the fact that the opportunities for securing farm homes are by no means equal to the demand for such opportunities which are certain to come from the men who are returning from their country's service. This was the situation as it appeared to those who gave thought to these matters and planned and purposed in the hope of devising some plan whereby in addition to the boundless opportunities which the country affords in industry and in agriculture, further opportunities both for employment and for securing a permanent foothold on the soil and a permanent home under one's own vine and fig tree might be provided.

The question was, How should we go about it? The country has already provided a plan whereby those having sufficient means to make payment of half the value of a farm home may secure the balance on long time and at a low rate of interest, and whereby those already having an interest in farm lands or homes may secure on favorable terms a loan equal to 50 per cent of their unincumbered holdings. The farm-loan act, while its terms are perhaps as liberal as a sound public policy justifies in the case of those who own or seek isolated individual holdings, does not meet the case of the returning soldier, with but little, if anything, in the way of savings, and particularly he whose first need is immediate employment.

Fortunately, we are not altogether lacking in examples or experience as to the means and methods which may be safely employed to enable those of earnest purpose, but having little in the way of material resources, to establish themselves in comfortable, satisfactory, and sustaining farm homes.

Our own experience under the reclamation projects of the West afford an illustration of the value of coordinated and cooperative effort. The experience of various foreign peoples have afforded helpful suggestions. The most recent, and perhaps the most helpful, object lesson comes to us from far Australia—that progressive Commonwealth which has pointed the way in several important lines—for instance, in the perfection of systems of land titles, and particularly in the improvement of ballot and election laws. Australia's plans, long carried out by a distinguished American, Dr. Elwood Meade, have been adopted with great success by California, where the Durham Colony affords an object lesson of what can be done through public agencies in affording opportunities for home building and farm-land development.

Experience at home and abroad has demonstrated the fact that a policy intended to afford opportunities to men of limited capital or savings for farm-home owning must, first of all, furnish employment, at least to those who desire that their period of saving with a view of farm-home owning shall be in the vicinity of or in connection with the development of the future home. This being true, it follows that such a policy must involve development and improvement, first, that the necessary employment may be furnished, and, still more important, that the future owner may secure the benefit of the increment which arises out of the development of his property from a raw, wild, and unattractive state into one in which it becomes developed, attractive, and in condition for immediate remunerative use.

To secure these necessary conditions the plan adopted must involve the improvement and development of reasonably compact tracts of considerable area, first, to render practicable the carrying on of the work of improvement and development under proper supervision and with such organization and the use of such tools as will produce the maximum benefit at the minimum of cost, and, second, in order that the undertaking may have the benefit and advantage of the inspiration and enthusiasm which, under proper organization, attends the united effort of a community toward ends proposed and intended to advance the interests and opportunities of each and every individual in the community.

A careful review of the conditions as I have outlined them and a thoughtful consideration of the problems involved have brought a large majority of those who had given these matters consideration to approximately identical views as to what should be done on behalf of the returning soldier, as to what could be done in a practical and helpful way. The general plan which was finally evolved finds its legislative outline in H. R. 487, reported by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] from the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill bears my name, but I claim no credit as a discoverer of the plan which the bill proposes to carry into effect. In fact, I know of no one who may properly figure as the Columbus of this legislation. No one invented it, because it is not an invention, much less an experiment. It is the legislative expression of a plan and policy that in a more or less modified way has had its successful demonstration in the practice and experience of our own country and of various peoples across the seas.

The general plan which the bill embodies has been referred to by some as the "Lane plan," because of the earnest indorsement of the fundamental features of the plan by the present Secretary of the Interior. Secretary Lane has long been a student of the questions involved and has been most earnest, faithful, and helpful in his advocacy and indorsement of a plan of development and settlement for the benefit of the returning soldier.

My interest in the returning soldier—my knowledge of what had been done at home and abroad in aiding men to serve themselves and their country at one and the same time by the development and acquisition of homes—led me to introduce a short bill in the last Congress, contemplating the policy which has been more fully developed in the bill now under consideration. Measures proposing the carrying out of a plan of soldier settlement were introduced by a number of gentlemen—Democrats and Republicans—one by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] was reported by the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands in the last Congress.

The Committee on Appropriations, of which I was at the time a member, reported and the Congress provided in the sundry civil act for the fiscal year which ended June 30 last an appropriation of $100,000 for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations with a view of securing information as to the locality of land that would furnish desirable projects under a plan such as is proposed in this bill, and such investigations were carried on extensively. The matter was, therefore, squarely before us at the beginning of this Congress.

Before the Congress assembled and soon after the expiration of the former Congress on March 4, I continued my studies and examinations of the various questions involved in connection with the matters now under discussion. It was suggested to me by a number of gentlemen that it might be wise for me to give my attention to the drafting and introduction of a soldier settlement bill. I hesitated somewhat to introduce such a measure because of my official responsibilities on the Republican side, and I only did so because of some urging and in the hope that I might lend at least my personal influence to the enactment of legislation which I believed to be sound. At no time have I sought to use any other than the personal influence which I may have in support of the measure, and I shall not do so, and shall expect that gentlemen shall view it and determine their attitude touching it without regard to its official sponsor.

If I am entitled to any especial credit in connection with the measure under consideration, it is in having endeavored to put in concrete legislative form a plan and purpose which has been in the minds of many men, and which has been more or less fully expressed in various bills.

Stated briefly, the bill provides a fund in the Treasury which is to be known as the "Soldier settlement fund," to be used for the purposes and objects set forth in the act. The bill carries no appropriation, but provides for annual appropriations by Congress on detailed estimates submitted by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will permit me to conclude, I shall be glad then to yield if I have the time.

Out of the appropriations for the soldier settlement fund the Secretary of the Interior "is authorized to acquire by gift, purchase, deed in trust, or otherwise the necessary lands for soldier settlement projects, and to utilize public lands for such purposes." The Secretary is further "authorized through such agencies as he may provide to engage in such undertakings and do and perform such work as, in his opinion, is necessary for the permanent reclamation or development of the lands of projects, and which he deems essential to place them in condition for use and cultivation, including the building of essential public roads."

The Secretary is authorized and instructed to divide the lands of projects "into farms suitable for the support of a family and, in the discretion of the Secretary, into smaller farm worker's tracts. Town sites suitable for the purposes of the project may be established, improved, and sold for the benefit of the project."

When the lands of a project have been improved and reclaimed, or developed and subdivided, they are sold to soldiers "who are not the owners or proprietors of farms or rural homes," preference being given "to those who have been employed or rendered substantial service in the development of any such projects."

The bill provides that the prices of farms and tracts "shall be fixed with a view of meeting the cost of each project," and "the price fixed for each farm, tract, or lot shall represent as nearly as practicable its selling value compared with the other units of the project." The soldier makes a first payment of 5 per centum of the sale price at the time of entering into contract for purchase, and the balance in amortizing payments extending over a period not to exceed 40 years.

For the purpose of enabling the soldier to improve his farm or tract in the way of buildings, fences, and so forth, loans not to exceed $1,500 to any one soldier, or 75 per cent of the value of the improvements, may be made, to be repaid in amortizing payments extending over a period not to exceed 10 years.

For the purpose of enabling the soldier settler to secure the necessary live stock and equipment, loans not to exceed $1,200 in the aggregate, or not to exceed 75 per cent of the cost of the live stock and 60 per cent of the equipment may be made, to be repaid in amortizing payments running over a period of five years. The bill also provides for certain emergency loans in the discretion of the Secretary. Four per cent interest is charged on all loans.

The bill provides that "projects shall be selected with a view to the development of one or more projects in each of the several States in which feasible projects may be found," and "no projects shall be finally selected and no lands shall be acquired, however, unless the price to be paid and the conditions under which they are to be acquired shall be approved" by the governor, or, in case of his failure to act, the land commissioner of the State in which the lands are located and "an appraiser designated by the Federal Farm Loan Board" and the Secretary of the Interior.

As a matter of practical operation the plan would work as follows: Assuming the passage of the bill in its present form, making $500,000,000 eventually available for appropriation but making no appropriation, it would be necessary immediately after the passage of the act to make an appropriation of possibly $100,000 to enable the Secretary of the Interior to make further investigations than he has made and to prepare and submit to the Congress an estimate covering the first projects he was prepared to recommend and approve. These estimates would necessarily give the estimated total cost of the completion of the project and an estimate of the money believed to be essential for the development of the project for the first fiscal year. After an examination of these estimates the Committee on Appropriations would make its recommendations of appropriations to the Congress.

As I have stated, the total amount authorized to be appropriated is $500,000,000. It is confidently expected that suitable lands will be found in practically all of the States, and the sum authorized to be eventually appropriated will completely develop one or more projects in all of the States. The development of enterprises of this character will extend over a period of from two to five years, so that the appropriations would cover at least a five-year period, beginning possibly with an appropriation of $75,000,000 the first year and increasing to as much as $125,000,000 per year as the projects are developing. If the projects are successful, as we are confident they will be, a greater portion of this sum will be eventually returned to the Treasury by repayments, and in the meantime the sums expended will bear 4 per cent interest until paid. There is, of course, the possibility that some projects will be less successful than others, but the experience of Australia, the experience of California, and our own experience under the reclamation law afford us substantial ground for the belief that carefully selected and intelligently directed these enterprises will all be successful from the standpoint of the soldier home builder and will return substantially the entire outlay to the Treasury.

It is believed that areas suitable for the projects contemplated will be found in almost every State of the Union. The character of the lands selected and of the work undertaken will vary widely, and depend, of course, entirely on the character of the lands and of the kind of operation necessary to render them immediately useful, attractive, and available for farm homes. In New England, New York, and other sections of the East, the areas selected would be such as had been wholly or partly abandoned, or never fully utilized, for farming purposes, and in the majority of cases projects in those States would undoubtedly be less in area than in the States farther south return to normal conditions; problems the solution of which shall start the Nation on that long road of peaceful progress and prosperity which we hope lies before us. And as we have thought of these things our minds have naturally turned to the question of what could be done and what ought to be done to insure for the returning soldier conditions of opportunity such as men who have offered their lives to their country are entitled to have.

For the purpose of enabling the soldier settler to secure the necessary live stock and equipment, loans not to exceed $1,200 in the aggregate, or not to exceed 75 per cent of the cost of the live stock and 60 per cent of the equipment may be made, to be repaid in amortizing payments running over a period of five years. The bill also provides for certain emergency loans in the discretion of the Secretary. Four per cent interest is charged on all loans.

The bill provides that "projects shall be selected with a view to the development of one or more projects in each of the several States in which feasible projects may be found," and "no projects shall be finally selected and no lands shall be acquired, however, unless the price to be paid and the conditions under which they are to be acquired shall be approved" by the governor, or, in case of his failure to act, the land commissioner of the State in which the lands are located and "an appraiser designated by the Federal Farm Loan Board" and the Secretary of the Interior.

As a matter of practical operation the plan would work as follows: Assuming the passage of the bill in its present form, making $500,000,000 eventually available for appropriation but making no appropriation, it would be necessary immediately after the passage of the act to make an appropriation of possibly $100,000 to enable the Secretary of the Interior to make further investigations than he has made and to prepare and submit to the Congress an estimate covering the first projects he was prepared to recommend and approve. These estimates would necessarily give the estimated total cost of the completion of the project and an estimate of the money believed to be essential for the development of the project for the first fiscal year. After an examination of these estimates the Committee on Appropriations would make its recommendations of appropriations to the Congress.

As I have stated, the total amount authorized to be appropriated is $500,000,000. It is confidently expected that suitable lands will be found in practically all of the States, and the sum authorized to be eventually appropriated will completely develop one or more projects in all of the States. The development of enterprises of this character will extend over a period of from two to five years, so that the appropriations would cover at least a five-year period, beginning possibly with an appropriation of $75,000,000 the first year and increasing to as much as $125,000,000 per year as the projects are developing. If the projects are successful, as we are confident they will be, a greater portion of this sum will be eventually returned to the Treasury by repayments, and in the meantime the sums expended will bear 4 per cent interest until paid. There is, of course, the possibility that some projects will be less successful than others, but the experience of Australia, the experience of California, and our own experience under the reclamation law afford us substantial ground for the belief that carefully selected and intelligently directed these enterprises will all be successful from the standpoint of the soldier home builder and will return substantially the entire outlay to the Treasury.

It is believed that areas suitable for the projects contemplated will be found in almost every State of the Union. The character of the lands selected and of the work undertaken will vary widely, and depend, of course, entirely on the character of the lands and of the kind of operation necessary to render them immediately useful, attractive, and available for farm homes. In New England, New York, and other sections of the East, the areas selected would be such as had been wholly or partly abandoned, or never fully utilized, for farming purposes, and in the majority of cases projects in those States would undoubtedly be less in area than in the States farther south and west. The work undertaken would be such as would be found necessary to bring or restore the lands to a remuneratively usable condition, and would cover a wide range of effort, including clearing, grading, smoothing, fertilizing, and the necessary road building

In the Middle States the projects would in some instances correspond in character to those of New York and New England, with possibly less necessity for fertilization and an increase in the work of drainage.

In some of the Northern, Central, and Western States the problem would be largely one of the drainage and clearing of cut-over areas.

In the Southern and south Central States the problems would, in the main, be those of drainage and the clearing and leveling of cut-over lands, with large areas available for projects.

In the far West most of the projects would be those requiring reclamation by the application of water—irrigation enterprises.

Each section of the country would present certain problems of the same general character, but each and every project would also present its own peculiar problems. The projects would, of course, vary in size, depending upon the amount of land available for the enterprise, but as far as possible they should embrace a sufficient area to make possible a continuous and intelligent supervision and the utilization of such organization and equipment as would produce the maximum beneficial result with the least outlay.

Projects would probably require from two to five years for their development, depending upon their size and the character of the work to be done, during which period the prospective purchaser, or owner, would have employment, and during which period, with the hope and prospect of securing a home, he would have the greatest possible incentive to save.

The 5 per cent first payment required would, on the basis of an estimated average value of $5,000 per farm, amount to $250, a sum which the soldier ought to be able to easily save during the period of development.

The farm being purchased, the question of improvements would have to be met. The organization in charge of the development of the project could and would assist the soldier settler by purchase at wholesale prices of a portion, at least, of the material which would enter into the construction of his improvements. The 25 per cent of the value of the improvements which must be furnished by the soldier could, in the majority of cases, be furnished in labor. If he was of a mechanical turn he could aid in the erection of his house and barn—at any rate he could build his own fences and do work of various kinds that would meet his share of the total cost of the improvements.

The improvements having been provided within the maximum of the loans which may be made to the soldier for such purposes, he would be entitled to loans in a sum not to exceed $1,200 for the purchase of live stock and equipment. Here again the soldier settler would find ways and means of making his personal contribution of 25 per cent in the value of live stock and 40 per cent in the value of equipment toward the total value of property of this character on which he obtained his loan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Michigan please be good enough to grant me 10 minutes more?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Michigan, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman in the 10 minutes allotted to him now have sufficient time to answer some questions?

Mr. MONDELL. I should be delighted to do that, and just as soon as I am through with my statement I shall yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. The gentleman does not care to be interrupted now?

Mr. MONDELL. I would rather not. Of course, if I had plenty of time in which to answer questions, I would be very glad to do so now, because I am very anxious to answer all questions that may be asked.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. And I am very anxious to ask them.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is no more anxious to ask them than I am to answer them.

The plan and policy proposed in the bill under consideration has received the strongest support and indorsement of those, both in and out of official life, who have had the most experience with problems of this sort, of leaders and organizations of labor, of leaders and organizations of soldiers, and of thousands of individual soldiers.

It has also, as is inevitable, received its share of criticism. Most of this criticism has had its origin in the wholly unwarranted assumption that if we are to enact legislation particularly for the benefit of the soldiers it must be of a character that will confer some direct and specific benefit on each and every man who wore a uniform. I have already pointed out how thoroughly untenable, either from the standpoint of the soldier or the standpoint of the country, that process of reasoning is.

The plan proposed in the bill has been fiercely assailed because it does not, in the language of its critics, do something for all of the returning soldiers. This kind of criticism is heard frequently from those who are favorable to showing their appreciation of the soldier by granting him a bonus. I want to express my appreciation of the good sense and good citizenship displayed by the membership of the American Legion in declaring against the plan of a general bonus. I know it is true that some States have given bonuses to their soldiers, and I have no disposition to question the wisdom or propriety of such action.

The States as States bore no considerable part of the cost of recruiting, paying, or providing for the soldiers. It was almost wholly a national expenditure, as it should have been, and it is entirely proper that the States, if they feel so disposed, should express the gratitude and appreciation of their people to the soldiers by an honorarium, or bonus, in such sum as it may please them to grant. But I can think of no action on the part of the Federal Government toward its soldiers less in keeping with the dignity of the Republic or more offensive to the sturdy spirit of independence and patriotism of the American soldier than to assume that we can measure his service and his sacrifice in dollars or repay it with a paltry stipend in the way of a bonus. The fact that a bonus as small as $125 per man would amount to a cash outlay in excess of the entire reimbursable sum made available by this bill, or that the sum of some of the bonuses which have been proposed would run into the tens and scores of billions, is the least objectionable feature of such proposals.

The idea that every valiant young American, rich or poor, is to have the sum of his patriotic sacrifice coldly calculated and doled out in a way that would, in the great majority of cases, be of little permanent value to him—and this in the time of his youth and strength—is so repugnant to every proper thinking person, soldier or civilian, that it is not entitled to serious consideration, and yet it has been urged as a substitute for a sound measure of opportunity and development such as we have before us.

Some very good people, who I fear have not given the matter very careful consideration, have criticized this measure because of the plan of development and settlement it proposes, and they have suggested in lieu thereof a plan which has come to be referred to as the "plan of infiltration." This plan was carefully considered by the Committtee on the Public Lands in connection with the consideration of the bill before us and was emphatically rejected by that committee.

When Australia first started, some years ago, on her effort to settle her lands and encourage "back-to-the-farm" movement, that Commonwealth provided for aid through infiltration—in other words, she loaned her people up to 100 per cent of the value of the farm property which they purchased and proposed to make a home upon. The scheme failed utterly, as it is bound to fail wherever tried, and for various reasons, which ought to be entirely patent to any thinking person. If it were safe as a business proposition to make loans to those who desire to purchase farms wherever their fancy suggests, an amendment to the farm-loan act would be the proper method through which to accomplish that purpose. But I have heard no suggestion of action along that line.

The plan of infiltration, so called, would invite those without as well as those with farming experience to embark on enterprises which, while involving no investment or risk on their part, might, under favorable conditions, bring an early cash benefit, large or small, and which, having been realized upon, the farm could be abandoned without loss to the purchaser. I can think of no scheme better calculated to undermine the moral stamina and to tempt questionable undertakings on the part of the soldier than such a scheme as that.

I can imagine nothing that would so thoroughly unsettle farm-land values as to have it known that the Federal Government proposed to create 4,000,000 potential farm buyers, each with the Federal Treasury at his back. If only half of the returning soldiers were tempted by a scheme like this and the purchasers were limited to $5,000 farms, the immediate outlay would be ten billions of dollars. I hesitate to contemplate the effects of legislation of that character, the unsettling effect upon the soldiers themselves, and the wild scramble of speculators to unload property.

Others would carry the plan of helping all the soldiers, as they state, even further and extend the Government credit to all of them in a sum sufficient to buy them a house and lot in case they did not desire to buy a farm. The limitless expenditure that such a plan would involve would be the least objectionable feature of it. It involves the fundamentally false idea, to which I have repeatedly referred, that these splendid young Americans in the very flower of their youth and strength are expecting the Government to put a prop under them and to afford each and all of them some peculiar benefit and advantage not enjoyed by the people of the country as a whole. No one would reject a theory of that kind with greater scorn than the average American soldier.

Opposition is voiced to the measure on the ground that it is a measure of reclamation and development rather than a plan to help the soldier—that it is in fact a scheme to utilize the soldier for the purpose of developing the waste places of the country. Early in my remarks I have called attention to some of the essentials of a successful enterprise purposed to enable those beginning with but little capital to acquire farm homes. Those essentials can only be met in enterprises of reclamation and development, and the fact that the bill contemplates making lands that are now largely useless, or lands that are not being utilized in the best possible way, valuable, useful, and attractive for successful and permanent home-making and home-keeping is the strongest possible argument in its favor, and the one fact which stamps it as sound, practical, and of real service and benefit to the soldier.

Assuming that it were practical, or, from certain viewpoints, commendable, to assist the soldier in securing possession of a farm now occupied and utilized, could any plan be devised less desirable from the standpoint of the best interests of the country than one which simply swapped one farm owner for another—displaced the man familiar with his surroundings and utilizing them to advantage for one entirely strange to the environment? What benefit would it be to the average soldier without capital to thus provide for him and to expect him to repay, without any capital at the beginning, the high value of a cultivated, improved, and occupied property?

The virtue of the plan proposed in the bill lies in the fact that it proposes to take lands which will either cost nothing, as in the case of public lands, or can be purchased at a small acreage price, as in the case of many cut-over or abandoned lands, or lands requiring drainage, and by organized effort on a large scale, with the best possible equipment and supervision, bring those lands to a condition where they will be available for intensive cultivation and in a condition to make residence upon them satisfactory and agreeable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Michigan to yield me five minutes more.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NICHOLS] would like to ask some questions, and therefore I yield five minutes more.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to finish my remarks, if I may, before I yield for questions.

Mr. FORDNEY. Very well; I will yield five minutes more.

Mr. MONDELL. If I could have 10 minutes more, I think I could yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield 10 mintues to the gentleman—5 minutes in which to conclude his statement and 5 minutes in which to answer questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. RUCKER. As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, no limit has been fixed on the time for debate.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is true; but we have requests for three hours of time on this side for general debate, and we will not get through with this bill in three days if we go on in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. The plan proposed in the bill gives the soldier the benefit of all the increased values created in bringing lands from a raw or neglected state into one of fertility and availability for immediate profitable use. Furthermore, the plan proposed gives the soldier the benefit of community effort, of the enthusiasm which is invariably aroused by the well-directed efforts of a considerable number of people toward a single end and purpose. The communities that will be built up and developed under this law will, to a considerable extent, revive and restore the spirit of industry, of self-sacrifice, and enthusiasm in the building up of a community and in the establishment of new homes which characterized the pioneer periods in the development of our country from the Alleghenies to the Pacific.

Instead of individuals or families without accumulations and frequently without experience, scattered and isolated here and there among more prosperous and well-established neighbors—struggling to secure that which their neighbors already enjoy and becoming disheartened and discouraged in the effort—we shall have communities of people, as we have had from the beginning of our history in all the pioneer periods, making a start in common, each animated by the same desire and purpose to secure a home, and all heartened, encouraged, and stimulated by the fact that from equally humble beginnings they were all striving for the same goal of competency and independence.

For one I am willing to accept the challenge, if a challenge it be, that this is, to a certain extent, a plan of reclamation and development. As such it would be sound, sane, and helpful legislation if applied to the entire population instead of being proposed wholly for the benefit of the soldier. It is a lamentable fact, and one which has challenged the serious and thoughtful consideration of many men, that with all of our progress and development, both in agriculture and industry, we still have considerable areas in the older and most thickly populated sections of the country which have never been utilized in a useful way, or which having been once utilized have, through neglect or the operation of certain economic laws, been abandoned. It is not well that this should be so, at least so far as regards those areas which are so situated and of such a character that they can, with proper effort and at a reasonable cost, be made to afford comfortable homes and contribute to the wealth of the country.

We have as a Nation been so impressed with the slogan "Go West, young man, and grow up with the country," our people have been so taken with the glamor of free and cheap western lands, that right here in sight of the dome of the Capitol, and almost in every Eastern State, there are areas adjacent to populous communities, easily reached by transportation, which at a reasonable cost can be made highly productive, that are practically valueless from an economic viewpoint and their condition a reflection on the country.

This very summer I have traveled several times over such an area within 100 miles of the Capitol. How it came to be abandoned, or at least allowed to relapse into a condition in which only an exceedingly limited portion of the area is utilized for cultivation, I am entirely at a loss to understand. The region is unusually attractive, and a slight outlay would make the transportation facilities ideal. The timber upon those portions that have been allowed to go back to forest would more than pay for the clearing. The formerly cultivated lands could be easily restored to fertility, and a community could be built up, through community effort under proper supervision and direction, which would not only afford many comfortable homes but contribute largely to the productive capacity of the region. It is certainly not an argument against the plan or purpose of this bill that it is calculated to restore to the highest and best use areas of that character.

There has been a class of criticism which I almost hesitate to refer to—the criticism of certain agriculturists and alleged agriculturists. Some one has defined an agriculturist as a man who "farms the farmer," and those are the gentlemen that I refer to. Some of them write for agricultural journals; some of them instruct the youth of the land in agriculture; and some simply play with agriculture in a dilettante fashion, or find their occupation in the maintenance of alleged agricultural organizations. I have been careful to describe the gentlemen to whom I refer, because I do not want anyone to fall into error of mistaking them for farmers, or mistake the criticism they make as originating with farmers. The burden of the song of these gentlemen has been that the measure I have been discussing will result in increasing the agricultural acreage of the country, and it is on that account to be condemned as an unwarranted and unjustifiable interference with the monopoly of production which the acreages now under cultivation are assumed by those gentlemen to be entitled to.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman now yield.

Mr. MONDELL. I shall conclude in a minute and will then be glad to yield.

One only needs to hear this criticism to know that it never came from a real farmer. The farmer may have his faults—no doubt he has—but his dearest enemy, if he has enemies, would never accuse him of the narrow vision, restricted view, which such a criticism embodies.

I have known many farmers one time and another, but I have never heard a real farmer express opposition to any plan or purpose of development on the ground that his product was thereby likely to be deprived of a monopoly of the market. The farmer may not be polished, but he at least has a sound and a sane vision of things, and he knows that with the growth and the development of his country and the increase of its population it is not only inevitable but it is desirable that increased areas should be brought under cultivation. Furthermore, the farmer knows that enterprises such as we are proposing, if they are successful beyond our fondest dreams, can not increase the enormous sum total of the products of this mighty and fertile land of ours to an extent that will greatly affect markets or prices.

There has also been more or less flippant and misleading criticism of the measure on the ground that it was planned and proposed with a view of developing desolate and arid lands of the West and the mosquito-infested swamp lands of the South, and that it would be of little advantage to other sections of the country. Such criticism, so far as it is not in the nature of churlish knocking, could only have been uttered out of ignorance of the provisions of the bill as I have outlined them. Every project undertaken must pass the scrutiny of the Committee on Appropriations and of the Congress; and if any section of the country fails to secure the inauguration of enterprises, it must be a section so blessed of Providence that it contains no areas that are not now profitably cultivated, a region in which the Secretary of the Interior has been entirely unable to discover a feasible area for development, or one whose people have not taken the trouble to call the opportunities for development which the section affords to the attention of the proper officials.

While I am personally not disturbed for fear the section of the country in which I live shall not receive the consideration under the bill to which it is entitled, I realize that under legislation of this character the most insistent demands are likely to come, and some of the most feasible projects are certain to be presented from among the older States of the Union.

Many of the men who will take advantage of this law have seen service overseas. They have seen the wonderful agricultural development of France, Belgium, and Germany. They have noted the intense cultivation and the abundant product of every available acre of these lands. They have seen cultivation in its most intensive and productive form carried to the very walls and thresholds of towns and cities and industries. They have been reminded, no doubt, of the contrast with parts of their own beloved land, where the development of industry and the lure of the West have left much of our available territory unreclaimed, undeveloped, abandoned. They can be depended upon to enter with enthusiasm upon a work which promises them a home and an independent livelihood, and at the same time lends itself to the development of their country. No more inspiring work can be proposed for the men who composed our gallant and invinciple army of the Great War. [Applause.]

If I have any time remaining, I shall be very glad now to answer any question that the gentleman from Michigan desires to propound.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman inform the House if this bill was conceived as a reclamation project or as a proposition for the returning soldier?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has been listening to my remarks, and I think I made myself very clear. I stated that it was conceived in the interest of the returning soldiers, and that the fact that it does propose reclamation is perhaps the strongest argument that can be made for it from the standpoint of the soldiers and of the country. A man just returned from Brest, wearing the uniform of his country, told me that for the last two months he had been discussing this bill, or a measure of this sort, with the returning soldiers, the men who are about to embark for home, and that they were enthusiastic about it and were particularly enthusiastic because the bill proposed to give them an opportunity to help develop their country in securing a home.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask the chairman of the committee to grant the gentleman from Wyoming five minutes more time, so that I may ask him some questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is in control of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield five minutes; but that is the last I shall be able to yield, because plenty of time will be had to discuss the matter when the measure comes up for consideration. We are in consideration of a matter that we want to pass to-day, which is very important.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I ask the gentleman from Wyoming if when he appeared before the Committee on the Public Lands in favor of th'' bill he did not make the statement before the committee that this was a reclamation project and that he would not be for it if it were not a reclamation project.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that I used those words, but in a certain sense that is true. I have tried to emphasize the fact that if we are to attempt to give men who start with little or no capital the opportunity to become farm-home owners we must first furnish them with employment and give them the opportunity to earn their first payments, and that, further, we must give them the benefit of the increment that comes from development, and in order to do that our projects must be projects of reclamation development.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. If the gentleman's plan is carried into effect, would it not tend to create soldier reservations in the country?

Mr. MONDELL. There would be settlements in which a great majority of the people would be soldiers. That was true after the Civil War in many parts of the West, where a large majority of the men who took public lands in certain localities were returned soldiers.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman how much, approximately, must a soldier have in cash to make his first payment on the farm?

Mr. MONDELL. Assuming the average value of $5,000, as I stated in my remarks, he would have to have $250, which he could easily save in from one to three and a half years, during which the project would be under development.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Of course, the soldier can not go on the farm without its being improved. He has got to have some place to live in——

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. He has got to have stock, has he not?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and all that is provided for in this bill.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. It has been stated before the committee—I believe in the gentleman's presence; perhaps he stated it—that approximately a soldier would have to have in the neighborhood of $1,200 to make the initial payment on this proposition before he went on it.

Mr. MONDELL. Nobody said anything in my presence about the soldier needing $1,200 to make his initial payment. That can not be true, for the initial payment is only 5 per cent of the value.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. What does the gentleman estimate it?

Mr. MONDELL. I have gone over it very carefully in my remarks and placed the average initial payment at $250 on the land.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Would the gentleman give the total of what he would have to have?

Mr. MONDELL. I think the soldier could start to work on one of these projects without any savings and work his payment out. This bill is drawn on the theory that any soldier who is willing to work can start on one of these projects without a dollar and during the period of development save enough money and contribute enough labor to meet all of his obligations as they arise; the bill is drafted on that theory.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I call the attention of the gentleman to the statement made by Mr. Davis, engineer of the Reclamation Service, before the committee, in which he said that the soldier would require approximately $1,200 for the average farm as an initial payment; that the soldier——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what Mr. Davis stated. The bill makes no such requirement as that. So I think the gentleman must have misunderstood Mr. Davis. The bill provides for a first payment of 5 per cent of the purchase price, which the soldier pays after a long period of employment on the project. Let me repeat that the plan proposed is one under which a soldier can start with practically no savings and work out a home. Of course, it will be better if he have some savings, but it will not be necessary if he will work and save.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. WHITE] to discuss this bill.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I want the gentlemen of this committee to know that it is with extreme diffidence that I take the floor in opposition to the Republican leader of the House. I am a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, having under consideration for something like five or six weeks this same bill which you have heard discussed to-day. Now, whatever I may say to you to-day will be of a very desultory character, and I will take one minute, or at least a fragment of the time that has been accorded me, to say to you that I will prepare my views upon this subject and will seek an opportunity to present them to the committee and to the House if this measure shall ever reach consideration by the House. But I want to call your attention, without notice, without preparation to speak to-day, without knowing what might be presented here by the gentleman from Wyoming in favor of this proposition—I want to call your attention, if I can collect my thoughts and arrange them, to one or two points. Now, we did not hear, gentlemen, in the hearings before the committee that there were propositions to establish these projects in the Eastern States, in the New England States. This seems to have been a later thought. But let it be as it may——

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. SINNOTT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it was not suggested that any of these projects could be established in the Eastern States?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I say this, sir, to you, as chairman of that committee, that in my recollection I did not hear of a single case where any gentleman came before that committee in those hearings suggesting that there could be such projects, and I make the statement——

Mr. SINNOTT. Does not the gentleman recall that Director Davis, of the Reclamation Service, referred to two, three, or possibly five projects in the State of Massachusetts and projects in New York and projects in Maine and projects in New Hampshire?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I have but five minutes, and I do not like to have the gentleman make a speech in my time. I want to answer that question, but I do not want the chairman of that committee to consume the few minutes of time allotted to me in making a speech out of my time.

Mr. SINNOTT. I wanted to set the Member right.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I will answer the gentleman's question. In my recollection the proposition was brought out on interrogation that such projects might be found in Massachusetts or in New York. [Applause.] But I want to call the attention of Members of the House to this proposition: I do not know how many counties there are in the State of New York. I have not looked that up. I do not know, and I want to ask the gentleman how many projects might be established in a single State—how many might be established in the State of New York? And if you establish one, if you establish two, or if you establish three, you make it necessary for every soldier in the State of New York to find employment or to find a home under the operations of the projects established.

Now, I want to lay down this proposition and this contention, that the great State of Illinois——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Can I have two minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I would welcome questions, although I am a new and bashful Member and I am a young man. [Laughter.] But I want to say here that I am against this proposition from start to finish. [Applause.] There is nothing good in it that I can see; and I am not prejudiced. I want to say to you that the great States of Illinois and Iowa—and I speak in the very delicacy of comparison—are the two best pieces of dirt in the world of their size, and they have been developed by individual initiative absolutely. They contain more agricultural wealth than any other two agricultural sections of the United States, and, so far as I know, of similar area in the entire world.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman if he remembers that the testimony before the committee was to the effect that a soldier had to have approximately $1,200 to pay down as an initial payment before he could take the farm; and also if the answer to that was not made, by the proponents of the bill, that the soldier could be given employment on these reclamation projects at $3 a day, and that with a wife and family he could save enough in from three to five years to pay that $1,200?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I so remember it, but I have not time to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended one hour.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Not to-day; but I want to announce to this committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Has my time expired?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I want to say to you, gentlemen, that this is a great question. I want to ask you, gentlemen—and I am speaking from the standpoint of an American—if you do not believe, in your good common sense and judgment, that a young man who has had training on a farm in any of the agricultural districts of the United States, and who desires to adopt that as his business and follow it, has not a better prospect for success and is a better asset for the Government of the United States if you allow him to select 80 acres of land or 40 acres that for a hundred different reasons may not have been brought under cultivation in the neighborhood, and in the district where he has lived, with the advice and counsel of his father and mother, than to go out to some Government-reclaimed land that we admit in the beginning must in the very nature of things partake largely of the nature of an experiment?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. As a young man did not the gentleman leave his father and mother and proceed to the new State of Kansas in the early days and become one of its most prominent and prosperous citizens?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Yes, sir; but not on a colonization scheme. [Applause.]

I want to tell the gentleman something else, and I want to call this committee's attention to another proposition: These lands will be reclaimed by the Government by extravagant Government methods, and all precedent and all history prove it, and it can not be otherwise. They will be reclaimed by labor that will be controlled by the union-labor organization and its rules absolutely. The lands will be reclaimed by labor paid on a schedule fixed at eight hours per day. I want to say to you gentlemen that the untrained, uninitiated soldier buying land that must be reclaimed, when it is known that the best land in this country has already been occupied and owned, has no chance whatever, when he shall have paid the overhead expense, to compete with the young, ambitious soldier who is willing to go on a piece of land and work from 12 to 16 hours a day to make a home for his wife and his children. [Applause.] Your common sense teaches you that.

In talking upon this subject in the committee I was interrogated. Let me make one statement. I want to make it here because I want you to hear it, and I want you to listen. I want to say to you, gentlemen, that no man should be compelled to work 12 hours a day or 16 hours a day, but, as a free American citizen, I want you to say and let it go out to the country, no man should be coerced; no man that wants to do anything for his own advancement or that of his family should be prohibited from working to the full limit of his power to achieve. [Applause.]

Mr. BOIES. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOIES. The Secretary of the Interior asserts that he has received from 50,000 to 60,000 applications from soldiers already. Will the gentleman see, if he can, as a member of the committee, that the evidence thereof is laid before this House for their investigation?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. At the proper time.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I will.

Mr. CANNON. Just for one suggestion. Will he ask every Member of the House on his honor how many letters he has received from private soldiers in favor of this bill? [Applause.]

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. That would be interesting information; very interesting information.

It is suggested by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and it is stated in the report of the majority, contemplating the vast expenditure, that the imagination reels and staggers under it. Well, I say to you gentlemen as a logical deduction, that if those propositions to which the gentleman referred look so good to the soldiers of the United States—and the preamble of the majority report says that they wanted something that would look good to them—then a proposition that would call for an investment of $16,000,000,000 must be a proposition that is better than the one that only 100,000 of the 4,000,000 soldiers of the American Army have indicated an intention to avail themselves of. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. JOHNSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, now that the smoke has cleared away after a two hours' battle royal over this bill among the Republicans, in which this bill has been flayed, I shall proceed with my speech.

Mr. Chairman, the war ended nine months ago and this Government immediately began the demobilization of the American soldiers. The Secretary of War to-day informs me that practically all of the soldiers will have been returned to America and be demobilized by the middle of September. These brave, heroic sons of America have returned to find their former positions filled by men and women who did not go to war; they find their property wasted, and those who had a business find it in confusion. Many of these gallant men have no homes to go to. They own no land, and in many cases are going from place to place seeking employment. This Nation owes them an obligation it can never pay, and this Congress has been designated by the people of this Nation to enact some legislation by which this obligation can in some measure be paid. America has always recognized her obligation to the men who have fought the battles for the preservation of the Nation. In the year 1812, in order to get men to enlist for military service, many thousands of acres of land were given them, and between the years 1812 and 1855 more than 64,000,000 acres of land were deeded or patented to men for military service.

Then came the homestead law. Every man who had served his country in a military capacity was, under the homestead law, entitled to 160 acres of land for a homestead. Thousands of men took advantage of the opportunity to acquire a home under this law, and as a result sections of the country which before the law was enacted were sparsely settled have become densely populated and is now the home of hundreds of thousands of happy and prosperous people, and since the great war between the States, recognizing the splendid services of the Federal soldiers, this Nation has paid to these veterans more than $6,000,000,000 by way of pensions, and during this session of Congress they have been voted several million dollars more. I merely mention this to show you the appreciation of the American people for the services of the soldiers.

Now, if we have done all this for the soldiers who volunteered to fight on their own land, among their own loved ones, how much more considerate ought we to be of the men who were drafted, taken away from their homes, their babies, their loved ones, their native land, and sent into foreign lands among strangers who speak another tongue, to fight to save other countries as well as our own. [Applause.] But when the tocsin of war was sounded these brave, heroic sons of America laid down for a time the peaceful and happy pursuits of civil life and took up arms in defense of justice, liberty, and freedom. They bade their wives and loved ones good-by, kissed the baby in the cradle, marched away under the flaunting Stars and Stripes, keeping step to the wild, glad music of war, to fight and die if need be for eternal right. These incomparable soldiers fought not for aggrandizement, not for the love of gold, but for higher, holier, and nobler things which go to make for human happiness in this life.

When the gloom of despondency hung like a cloud above the world, and even the heavens seemed to be in mourning, and defeat was staring the allied armies in the face, it was these brave boys who snatched victory from defeat, drove the German armies back across the Rhine, and raised the Stars and Stripes on captured ground. [Applause.]

But I am not here to-day to eulogize the soldiers—they need no eulogy—they need something more substantial. I have heard eulogies of these soldiers for several weeks, but now the time has come when something more substantial should be done for them. These men are entitled to something more than decorations, eulogies, and citations for bravery. Many of these young men have families, thousands have dependents, many of them have no money, no property, nothing with which to start anew the battle of life.

It is the duty of this Congress to do something for these men. It is time to quit talking and begin acting. Ours is the richest Nation on the face of the earth—our income is larger than any other two nations combined. In the United States at this time there are more than 300,000,000 acres of wild, unused land. This land belongs to a few corporations, a few individuals, and a portion of it belongs to the Government. This Nation, according to a statement published in a New York paper a few days ago, is short 1,000,000 homes. The population of the cities is growing twice as fast as the population in the country. The population of the whole country is increasing twice as fast as the number of farms is increasing. If this continues, within the next few years this country will be forced to import food with which to feed the people. Something must be done to encourage the people to return to the farms. This Government must do something to assist the people in acquiring homes. The large tracts of land held by a few individuals and corporations must be utilized to grow food and things with which to feed and clothe the Nation.

The many millions of people of this Nation must be given an opportunity to acquire a home. This Government must assist the people, and especially the soldiers of the late war. We boast of our greatness, of our wealth, our republican form of government where the people are supposed to rule, and in this great country we are doing less for our soldiers than the European countries have done for their soldiers. Long before the armistice was signed New Zealand, Australia, Canada, France, England, and other European countries were preparing homes and farms for their soldiers, and I am informed that in these countries where the soldiers have been aided in procuring farms the wild, uncultivated lands have been brought into use, and even this year prospects are excellent for good crops on these soldiers' farms.

Why can not this Government do something for its soldiers? They have saved the Nation—they have saved all you and I had and made it possible for us to be here to-day. They are entitled to more than ordinary consideration—they are entitled to the very best we have. Let us build homes for the soldiers, thereby erecting altars of patriotism which will teach their children love of home, love of country, and love of liberty. This country is passing through the most crucial time in its history.

New doctrines are being taught, and these doctrines are dangerous to a republican form of government. They find favor in large cities, where people are dissatisfied with their condition, but seldom will you find a man who owns his home a disrespecter of constituted authority and law. This feeling of unrest and dissatisfaction is born of an honest belief that the laborer does not get the fruits of his labor. He sees millionaires made from the fruits of his labor; he sees millions of acres of land owned by men who refuse to sell to him for a reasonable price. The land is unused and unproductive. He sees the thousands of city homes owned by a few rich men rented to the working class of people for exorbitant and outrageous prices. He sees his wages exacted by the rich profiteers and he begins to wonder if this really is a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

You can not find an anarchist or Bolshevist in the country on a farm, because there is no place on earth where patriotism and respect for law and constituted authority is taught like in the country home. Home makes the magic circle within which the careworn heart retreats to find rest from labor and disquietude of life. It is the unit of our civilization. The deepest and most unchangeable sentiment in the human soul is that of home affection. It is the school of human virtue. When regard for home ceases virtue dies. It is in the congested city where the criminal agitator and Bolshevist are found.

Mr. Chairman, we hear much of the back-to-the-farm movement, and I am very much in favor of encouraging the people to go back to the farm; but if you will persuade the people to return to the farms they must be made more attractive. The working man must be made to realize that there is something on the farm for him more than drudgery and hard work. He must be encouraged by the Government assisting him in a way that will make life more attractive. Life is not worth much to the man who has to toil all day and part of the night and rest just long enough to enable his body to begin toil the next morning. He should be able to farm in such a way that will do away with drudgery and unnecessary hard work. I believe the people who toil and labor should have some of the good things of this life as well as bear the burdens.

The farmer feeds and clothes the world. We are entirely dependent upon him for our food and raiment, and we should be willing to lend all the assistance necessary to encourage those who engage in this laudable vocation.

We have enacted some legislation, namely, the vocational training law and the rehabilitation act for the disabled soldiers. Thousands of soldiers—some blind, some wounded in one way or another—are taking advantage of this opportunity; but there are millions of strong, vigorous, healthy young men discharged from the military service whose ambition, I am sure, is to contribute their part toward making this a greater and a grander country, and I believe I speak the sentiments and aspirations of these men when I say they are anxious for a home and farm. It is true many of the discharged soldiers want no farm; they want nothing from the Government; they are fortunate in having property, business, or money; but while that is true, there are many who have no property nor money, and it is the duty of this Government to help those who need help. Justice to the poor means strength to the Nation.

The Public Lands Committee, presided over by a chairman whose honesty, fairness, and impartiality has never been surpassed, has been holding hearings on a bill known as the soldiers' land bill for more than two months, during which time farmers, lawyers, preachers, soldiers, laborers, and representatives of all classes of people have appeared before the committee and given testimony and made arguments relative to the bill, but after a patient and careful consideration of this subject for more than two months those who have appeared before the committee have been unable to suggest a wiser or more feasible plan for aiding the soldiers of the late war. I do not indorse it in toto, for it needs many material amendments.

There are some things in the bill, among them the interest charged, which I think should be eliminated. I do not believe these soldiers should be required to pay any interest to the Government. I do not deem it necessary to discuss at length the bill, as every Representative in Congress has had the bill before him and I am sure is thoroughly familiar with its provisions. It is provided by the bill that the Government shall purchase large tracts of land for the development of soldiers' homes. These lands are to be subdivided into tracts sufficiently large for a farm. It is proposed that the Government shall build the homes under the direction of the soldier-purchaser; that the farm is to be cleared and put in a state of cultivation by the Government. It is proposed that the Government will loan to the soldier-farmer $1,500 with which to purchase live stock and $1,000 for farming implements and other things necessary on the farm. This farm is to be sold to the soldier at a reasonable value on 40 years' time at 4 per cent interest per annum. It is proposed that the farmer shall have the benefit of the wholesale purchase price of the things used on his farm and that a bureau of markets shall be established whereby the farmer can sell the products of his farm direct to the consumer, thereby getting the full benefit of the fruits of his labor on the farm. It is proposed to establish in these communities the things necessary to make country life attractive to the farmer and his family. Good roads connecting with the principal thoroughfares of the county in which these projects are to be built. These young farmers are to be taught free of charge by the Government the intelligent methods of farming; they will be taught the adaptability of the land, stock raising, and all the things necessary for the success of a farm.

These soldiers who wish to take advantage of this opportunity will be given employment by the Government at a remunerative wage while the farms are being prepared for them. By this method a premium will be put upon initiative and individual effort. This farm shall be paid for by the soldier in amortizing payments extending over a period of 40 years. If the farmer pays his farm out after five years, the Government will give him a patent and he thereby becomes the owner in fee simple. Under this bill the Secretary of the Interior has full authority not only to establish the projects as I have just mentioned but may establish separate farm workers' tracts or individual farms for the soldiers.

The bill proposes that the Secretary of the Interior report to Congress every year touching the expenditures in the development of the farms for soldiers and estimating the amount necessary for the continuation of such developments. The Secretary of the Interior tells us that there are lands in every State of the Union on which there can be established projects for soldiers' farms. Many thousands of soldiers have written letters to the Secretary of the Interior requesting an opportunity to take advantage of the benefits of this law if Congress passes it. I have received many letters from soldiers in which they express a desire to build a home according to the methods set forth in this bill.

Are we to do less for our soldiers than we have done for foreigners? We have loaned to foreign countries about $10,000,000,000.

We loaned—

Belgium	$343,445,000.00
Cuba	10,000,000.00
Czechoslovakia	55,330,000.00
France	3,047,974,777.24
Great Britain	4,316,000,000.00
Greece	48,236,629.05
Italy	1,587,675,945.99
Liberia	5,000,000.00
Roumania	30,000,000.00
Russia	187,729,750.00
Serbia	26,780,465.56
Total	9,658,172,567.84

We have recently spent more than $100,000,000 in feeding foreigners in other countries, and yet we have done practically nothing for our own soldiers.

The plan of the soldiers' land bill has been criticized by some, but it has met the approval and commendation of thousands where one has criticized.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I would like to yield to the distinguished gentleman, but my time is limited.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Bankers and money lenders of the larger cities are opposed to this bill because it interferes with their lending money at 8 per cent interest to the soldiers with which to buy farms and homes. The bill has been approved by the American Soldiers' Legion, by thousands of soldiers individually, farmers' organizations, commercial organizations, and many others who have the welfare of the soldier at heart.

The paramount question before the American people to-day is the high cost of living. While the people are apparently enjoying an era of prosperity, if we are to judge by the money in circulation, it is apparent to every thoughtful man in the country that money is worth less than it has been for many years, and the cost of necessities of life is increasing daily.

It has been shown that five or six large corporations are in control of practically all of the meat and many other food products of this Nation. The people are crying out against profiteering and demanding that Congress do something to relieve the situation. This must be done immediately. I am ready to vote for any bill giving the necessary relief to our people.

While we amended the food-control bill in the House last Friday, and it is now pending in the Senate, I fear the bill will not be sufficient to correct all the evils of these profiteers. I believe all profiteers and hoarders of food should be sent to the penitentiary; that no money fine should be assessed. Imprisonment of these rich robbers is the only remedy; but after we have forced on the market all the food that has been hoarded by these corporations and people, and after this food is consumed, there will be another cry in the country on account of scarcity of food, unless something is done toward encouraging more people to raise food products.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I would rather not yield. I would like to finish my statement first.

Millions of people have left the farms and gone to the cities, and if the high cost of living is to be kept within reason in this country more people must become producers.

These soldiers have returned to this country believing that this country was grateful for their heroic services, believing that this Nation would show its appreciation by assisting them to start anew the battle of life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have about five minutes more.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I thank the gentleman.

You and I remained at home and continued the prosecution of our business. Many people became wealthy because of the war. There were more millionaires made in the United States during the war than in any other time in the history of this Nation. Many people took advantage of conditions to rob other people by way of high, extortionate, and unreasonable prices. These soldiers were taken away from their babies, their wives, and other loved ones, required to give up their businesses and leave their possessions, abandon their employment, and expose their breast to the brutal army of Germany. There were more than 70,000 of these brave men who walked into the jaws of death and now sleep in Flanders field while the gentle zephyrs chant requiem over their graves.

Mr. Chairman, while these men stood in the trenches in the snow and sleet, in the rain and storm, during the long dark hours of the night, their minds came back to America and to their loved ones. These brave boys who saved this country believed that this Nation would be grateful for the supreme sacrifice they were making—they believed that this Nation would care for their wives and families. The Nation demands that this be done. The Nation demands that gratitude be expressed in a substantial way for the services rendered by these men in preserving this Government. In the language of President Lincoln, "We should bind up the Nation's wounds and care for him who has borne the brunt of battle and for his widow and his orphan." We should also care for those who have survived the war.

You Republicans are in control of both branches of this Congress. You can pass this law or you can defeat it. There are nearly 4,000,000 voters in this country who took part in this war. These men are watching you, they are going to hold you responsible for whatever Congress does, they are going to give credit where credit is due. You have said in many speeches delivered on your side of the House that you are anxious, ready, and willing to do something for the soldiers. The time has come for you to act. You have eulogized the soldiers and led your constituents at home to believe that you would vote for any reasonable or feasible plan for assisting the soldiers in obtaining a home. Man's nature demands a home—it is the first essential element of our social being. Life can not be complete without home relations.

This country is much disturbed by the growth of Bolshevism and revolutionary ideals. The way to destroy Bolshevism and anarchism and make patriotism is by assisting men in procuring homes. Any man would rather fight for a home than a boarding house. [Applause.]

Any man who owns his home feels more interested in his country than if he does not own the home. He becomes a taxpayer and feels that he is helping to carry the burdens of government. If you do not pass this law or give relief to the soldiers what are you going to tell the people when you go back home? The soldiers will feel that their efforts in saving this Nation are not appreciated—they will go about saying "justice stands afar off and truth lies bleeding in the street." [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, fortunately for this country, honor and patriotism are not confined to any one political party or to any creed. [Applause.] The Republicans and Democrats in this House and outside are anxious to extend relief to the returned soldiers. But in doing that we ought not lose sight of the beneficiaries.

Let us keep them in mind to the exclusion of everyone else. [Applause.] Many weeks of hearings have been held on this bill before the Committee on the Public Lands. The gentlemen prominent in gleaning facts in connection with this land project are Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan, Mr. BENHAM of Indiana, Mr. WHITE of Kansas, and Mr. SNELL of New York. These gentlemen in the hearings brought out some very interesting facts. My colleague, Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan, has been conspicuous in advocating the welfare of the soldier and in disclosing the insidious activities of forces more concerned with their selfish interests than they are in returned soldiers.

It is a burning shame that greed and avarice will not stay its activities even when the future welfare of the American soldier is under consideration. Parliamentary language can not express my contempt for the person or organization who, in the heartless rush for gain, attempts to exploit the soldier. This House, the soldiers, sailors, and marines, are indebted to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NICHOLS] for turning the searchlight of scrutiny on the covert activities of organizations whose great interest in the passage of this legislation is their own probable gain and not the welfare of the boys who fought this war. Gentlemen of the House, do you need a high-priced press agent, hired by the Southern Land & Development Organization, to tell you what the returned soldier wants or needs? I for one wish to consult the soldier himself rather than press agents of private corporations.

Do you not think the returned soldier who has suffered a literal hell and has obeyed orders for two years is now entitled to speak for himself and say what he wants? If he could be trusted to defend the honor and glory of our country, in justice and fairness he certainly ought to be trusted now with at least an opinion as to his future welfare and an opportunity to consider it without vicious propaganda and distorted facts.

But petty pride of position prevents, and partisan politics pushes patriotism into the background. Great agencies to obtain control of the country's destinies for power and influence of cliques of ambitious men spread broadcast statements that one party, and only one party, stands against this harmful bill, and attempts to label this a Republican measure, because it is introduced by the Republican floor leader of the House. Look at the names of those who signed the minority report. They are all Republicans—NICHOLS, WHITE, BENHAM, SNELL—all Republicans. And yet a Democratic Congressman, SCOTT FERRIS, uses the Democratic national campaign committee to assail this bill as a Republican measure. This measure was suggested by and has the approval of a Democratic Secretary of the Interior; was drawn and introduced by a man high in the councils of the Republican Party; was indorsed in committee by Republicans and Democrats in almost equal number; and here am I, a lifelong Republican, opposing it.

Gentlemen, that is, I fear, a type, an exaggerated type to be sure, but none the less a type, of the baleful influence of that extreme partisanship against which Washington in his farewell address warned as solemnly and at great length as he did in his now frequently quoted words against entangling alliances.

Ever since the bill was introduced a Mr. Harris, representing the Big Horn Development Co., of Montana, has been spending his evenings at the K. of C. and Y. M. C. A. headquarters in the city, frequented by large numbers of soldiers, sailors, and marines. He has devoted a great deal of affable attention to these boys in the apparent effort to make them believe that this bill excels the millenium. Is it necessary to convert the soldier to a realization of what he wants? According to the testimony of the hearings, not to exceed 80,000 soldiers can be taken care of under this bill. That number is one fifty-sixth of the Army and Navy. Do you wish to penalize the other 3,700,000, as well as those who do not wish to become farmers?

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] says a soldier can go on one of these farms without a penny in his pocket and by thrift, perseverance, and industry he can pay for the farm in 40 years. Does this House wish to put a soldier on one of these farms under those conditions? If you do, I do not.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Is it not true that in the public-land States 75 per cent of the people have become prosperous farmers without any means whatever when they went there, except an ambition to succeed and establish themselves in a new country?

Mr. SCOTT. No; I doubt the percentage.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That is true. I live there, and I know the conditions.

Mr. SCOTT. Following the gentleman's argument, I ask him if he wishes to put any soldier on a waste, barren, contemptible piece of land, without a nickel in his pocket, and expect him to make a living for himself and family and pay for the farm?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is not likely that such a condition will arise. What does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. SCOTT. That is what I am criticizing. What right have you and I to suggest? Let the soldier do his own suggesting. He ought to know better than anyone on earth what he wants and needs. I object to cramming this land reclamation bill down his throat as an antidote. There are hundreds of thousands of returned soldiers, sailors, and marines who are entitled to substantial relief from their Government. They deserve that consideration from this Congress. "All that glitters is not gold." And I refuse to support a soldiers' relief bill which is no relief at all. Any legislation that this Congress approves should be a benefit, not a burden.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH].

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think I should say at the outset that the matter I desire and intend to present to the House has not been the subject of investigation by any committee of this House, either select or otherwise. The facts I wish to present are the result of my own investigation.

I have asked for time to address the House to present the facts in regard to a situation which I have referred to upon the floor heretofore, and about which there seems to have developed quite a controversy. That there should have been any controversy about it seemed to me to be strange. The matter was of interest not only of the Army management but to every patriotic American citizen, for it related to the treatment of American soldiers in Europe after the signing of the armistice. Some may regard it as water over the mill, but in the interest of justice, and in order that a warning may be sounded which will prevent such things ever happening again, and most of all, that the integrity of constituents of mine who have made complaints may be upheld and vindicated, I feel it is my duty to clear the matter up and place responsibility where it belongs.

After the signing of the armistice, and for some reason the true purpose of which has never been officially explained, American troops were ordered into Italy, Austria, and Montenegro, and were stationed along the eastern coast of the Adriatic Sea in the Dalmatia Provinces.

Some time ago I wrote the Secretary of War asking for information relative to the sending of American troops after the signing of the armistice into Italy and the Provinces mentioned. On June 16, 1919, I received a letter signed by the Assistant Chief of Staff of the War Department, director of operations, which letter I shall insert in the RECORD and from which I quote the following:

> In November, after the signing of the armistice, one battalion of this regiment (the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry) was ordered to Trieste; one battalion to Fiume, and one battalion to Cattaro. The reasons for dividing the regiment in this manner and for sending the battalions to these particular cities can be given only by the Italian high command; but it is presumed that this action was based on a desire to exploit as widely as possible the moral effect of the presence of American troops.

The world is familiar with the dispute over Fiume. This dispute came near disrupting the peace conference, and caused the one break that was really serious among the allied representatives at the peace table. It is clear from an examination of the documents setting out the claims of Italy and of the Jugo-Slavs that one of Italy's predominant purposes in the war was to get control of the ports, if not the Provinces, on the east coast of the Adriatic Sea.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is the gentleman still quoting?

Mr. McCULLOCH. No.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Was this order made by the Secretary of War or by Gen. Pershing?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I am not informed as to who made the order. I am simply informed by the Assistant Chief of Staff that these troops were ordered into Italy and that they were to be under the direction of the Italian high command, and that they were probably sent there for the purpose of exploitation. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that I was not quoting after the words "the moral effect of the presence of American troops."

It is stated in an official communication, signed by the Italian premier, that Italy went to war with two aims—first the liberation of her oppressed sons, and, second, the attainment of safe frontiers by land and sea. The control of the east coast of the Adriatic, including the Dalmatia Provinces, has been a disputed question at the peace conference even though it was involved in one of Italy's chief aims in the war.

President Wilson took a position against Italy and in favor of the Jugo-Slavs, and on April 23, 1919, issued a statement which amounted to an emphatic declaration that he would not yield on the Adriatic question, so that the territorial advantage sought by Italy was regarded by President Wilson as unjust, and was rejected by him; but for a period of three months after the signing of the armistice it would seem that American soldiers, under the direction of the Italian high command, were being used for the purpose of coercing States, new and old, on the east coast of the Adriatic to accept the demands of Italy which the President, on April 23, 1919, declared to be unjust. In other words, it seems American soldiers, representing a Government that has never entered upon a war of conquest, were being used as the tools of the Italian Government for the purpose of conquest, and that they were being used to exploit and coerce peoples that were friendly and allied with America in the war to give up territory or territorial advantage which it later developed the President of the United States, as our chief peace envoy, contended should not be given up.

The Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry was not sent into Italy and to the east coast of the Adriatic Sea after the singing of the armistice to fight Germany or Austria, nor any of the Central Powers. The war was in effect over, but they were sent there for purposes of exploitation, being involved in the intrigues and the disputes among friendly allies in matters of territorial division; the dividing up of spoils. Were they being used to strengthen a claim that afterwards the President of the United States declared to be unjust?

If this is true, it is a sad commentary upon the efficiency of the American high command that any such a thing should have been permitted to occur.

When the armistice was signed American troops should either have been sent home or held encamped and inactive until the war was either resumed or the peace treaty signed. Personally, I think they should have been brought home. But our troops, as represented by the Three hundred and thirty-second Regiment, were not only exploited after the armistice was signed but they were mistreated and half starved and subjected to hardships greater than those they endured during the war and while in the front-line trenches. Not content with using them and exploiting them, they starved them.

Who is responsible for American soldiers being subject to the orders of the Italian high command after the armistice was signed? Who is responsible for the use of American troops by some foreign Government for purposes of exploitation? That American troops should have been so used and thus exploited is beyond comprehension.

I have referred to this matter as a preface to the main subject that I desire to discuss for the purpose of pointing out that the mistreatment about which complaints have been filed with me was after the signing of the armistice, and when the war was in effect over and on an expedition which was contrary to every policy of the American people from the beginning of the Government, contrary to every American tradition, and in direct opposition to the policy as laid down later by the President of the United States himself. The soldiers to whom I shall presently refer were members of Company H of the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, were ordered to Cattro in the Dalmatian district, and were on the expedition I have referred to under the direction of the Italian high command.

The members of Company H, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, come largely from my home town and county, and all of them are from the State of Ohio. In fact, the entire Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry was made up of Ohio boys. On the night of the signing of the armistice these boys were in the front-line trenches within range of the Austrian fire, and after the signing of the armistice they moved up to the point of the Austrian retreat. They were real fighting men, with an enviable record as soldiers, and they represent, when at home, the very best people of Canton and Stark County; they are reputable, responsible, and truthful.

Before the signing of the armistice and before they were ordered upon this expedition of exploitation there did not come to my ear a single word of complaint by any member of Company H or of the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry. They were not the kind to complain while the fighting was going on. They were there to do their duty, and they did it.

Some time prior to February 5, 1919, which was almost three months after the signing of the armistice, I began receiving letters from parents and friends of members of Company H, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, then stationed at Cattro, Dalmatia, Austria. Among other letters I received one from Homer E. Black, a prominent young lawyer in my home town, calling attention to the complaints that had been made in regard to the treatment of the soldiers in Company H and asking that some action be taken at once that would relieve the situation. The statements contained in these complaints were of such a startling nature that I felt called upon to take some action immediately. Having in mind only that conditions might be relieved, and desiring that what was done, if anything, should be really effective, I talked the matter over with Members of the House, including some of the leaders, and decided to present the matter to the House by submitting the Black letter and asking for an immediate investigation. This I did on February 5, 1919.

As this controversy—and it now seems to have developed into a controversy—is based upon the letter of Mr. Black which I inserted in the RECORD in connection with my remarks on February 5, 1919, I feel that I should read the letter to the House before attempting to present the facts sustaining the charges and complaints made in the letter:

CANTON, OHIO, January 3, 1919.

Hon. ROSCOE C. McCULLOCH, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. McCULLOCH: The writer has had so many complaints relative to the treatment received by soldiers in Company H, Second Battalion, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, now stationed at Cattaro, Dalmatia, Austria, that he felt it his duty to bring it to your attention. Briefly, the complaints are that the soldiers are being fed upon Italian rations and are not receiving sufficient food; in fact, several soldiers writing to their parents, and who are personally known to the writer, and whose honor, honesty, and integrity could not be questioned, stated that the food was so scarce that it was necessary for them to steal food in order to exist. They also complained that they have received no clothes of any kind since early last fall, and that they have mended and patched their clothing until it will hardly hold together. Another complaint is that all the commissioned officers located at this point, with the exception of one lieutenant, are drinking to excess and are drunk practically all the time, and that their actions are so disgusting and disgraceful that the officers of the English, French, and Italian armies look down upon them with disgust.

Another complaint is that the soldiers have not received any pay for a number of months. These complaints are from letters which I have read, and it is incomprehensible that our boys must be fed upon horse meat, spaghetti, and macaroni, without sufficient clothing, and officered by drunkards. This is a matter that should not be delayed by a red-tape investigation but should be relieved at once, and, because of your activity and the elegant results you obtain for the people of your district, I believe that you will make things hum to obtain the necessary relief.

Yours, very truly, HOMER E. BLACK.

It should be observed, in view of statements to which I shall presently refer, that the complaints relate to the treatment of the soldiers of Company H, Second Battalion, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, which was then stationed at Cattaro, Dalmatia, Austria; that no reference of any kind is made to any other company or part of that regiment, the complaints being confined entirely to one company, namely, Company H.

After presenting the letter of Mr. Black to the House I made no comment upon the charges, except only to call attention to the fact that Mr. Black is a reliable man, and to ask that an investigation be promptly made disclosing the truth or falsity of the charges. I felt that every true American citizen would be interested in a prompt investigation; that the War Department would be interested in it; that the House would be interested in it; and, above all, if the charges were true, an investigation would result in the conditions being immediately remedied. If untrue, those charged with responsibility would be exonerated.

My attitude in the matter can best be gathered from the following paragraph in my speech which I delivered at the time I presented Mr. Black's letter to the House, and which is as follows:

I say that it is our duty to investigate these cases, to investigate these complaints, and then let the report be made. If it exonerates the War Department, well and good; if there are conditions over there which are beyond control, or if there has been no negligence, if the charges are not well founded, then let the War Department be exonerated; but if they are guilty of misconduct, then it is our duty to act, since we have the power to act, and see that those who are guilty are punished.

I believe that anyone who will take the trouble to read the RECORD and my speech will agree that my attitude was more than fair to the War Department and to the officers and to everybody concerned.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. When I was in Europe at the time the gentleman mentioned, when communications were being written by the President of the United States about Fiume, some of our own soldiers in Italy at the time told me that they were obliged to put our men into civilian uniform to stop their being killed by uprising of Italian people.

Mr. McCULLOCH. That coincides with what I shall present.

I was surprised beyond expression in words when on or about February 12, only seven days after the letter appeared in the RECORD, I read in a newspaper an interview by the Secretary of War in which he was reported to have said when asked about the charges contained in the letter of Mr. Black:

Of course, the allegations are untrue. It is inconceivable that anyone will believe such slanderous statements.

The article in which the Secretary of War was quoted went on to say that because of letters which the Secretary had received since the publication of the Black letter, expressing the anxiety of parents, he had cabled to Gen. Pershing for a detailed report as to the exact conditions pertaining to the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry. After reading the statement accredited to the Secretary of War in the interview, I wrote him a letter asking him if he had been correctly quoted. On February 25 I received a reply from the Secretary of War in which he said:

To specifically answer your inquiry, I did express, and do express, my disbelief in the charges made in Mr. Black's letter. The preliminary report which I have quoted above is strong evidence in support of my statement.

I shall submit the Secretary of War's letter in connection with my remarks, and I desire to call attention to the fact that while the complaints in Mr. Black's letter related only to Company H of the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, stationed at Cattaro, the investigation to which the Secretary of War refers was made of the entire regiment and of companies stationed near Genoa, 800 miles away from Cattaro. In one of the reports to which the Secretary of War refers, and which he says is strong evidence that the charges were untrue, the very first line is as follows:

Have not seen battalion at Cattaro.

Yet the Secretary of War cites that report as evidence disapproving the charges when it is admitted that no investigation had been made of Company H or the battalion at Cattaro, but the denial was based upon an investigation made 800 miles away from Company H and of companies about which no complaints were made so far as the RECORD disclosed.

During the war it became a habit with Secretary Baker to give a clean bill of health to the Army management, especially the officers, and to acquit them of all responsibility in regard to complaints made without investigation. I do not say that he willfully misrepresented this situation. He may not have examined the report carefully, but to disapprove charges of the startling and serious character of those contained in Mr. Black's letter upon a report of an investigation of companies not involved and 800 miles away is either an evidence of inefficiency or of unfairness.

The letter received on March 1 from the Secretary of War, which I desire to make a part of the RECORD, in answer to my letter to him dated February 27, 1919, probably furnished the key to the attitude of the Secretary of War. From that letter I quote the following:

The charges made in regard to the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, so far as relates to insufficiency of food and clothing, seems to be adequately disposed of by the two inspection reports received by me, and of which copies have been sent to you. They constitute, however, the least important elements of the charges set forth in the letter of Mr. Black. The one which it seems to me is of the greatest gravity is that assailing the character of the officers in the regiment, and asserting that with the exception of one lieutenant they are all drunk practically most of the time. This, of course, is a grave blemish upon the reputation of every officer in that regiment.

In the Secretary of War's letter dated February 25, 1919, in the first three lines of the first paragraph, he specifically states that the charges relate only to Company H of the Three hundred and thirty-second Regiment, and in his letter of March 1, 1919, he makes the startling statement that the charges are a reflection on the officers of the entire regiment. By the same logic he might as well contend that charges made against officers of Company H were a reflection upon officers of the entire American Expeditonary Forces. The Secretary of War, himself, is responsible for the casting of an aspersion, if one is cast, upon officers other than the officers of Company H, and it is due the officers of that regiment to have the Secretary of War make public an admission of his error. But more startling still is the statement of the Secretary of War in his letter dated March 1, 1919, that whether the boys had sufficient food and clothing was less important than the assailing of the character of an officer.

If an officer were attacked, that should be the subject, according to the Secretary of War, of drastic action and immediate investigation, but it was of relatively small importance that the boys should be going naked and half starved.

I have no sympathy with any such an autocratic system. It is un-American and contrary to every principle of our Republic and I want to express, not only my disapproval of any such an attitude, but I think it should be the subject of the severest condemnation.

Now, what are the real facts? Interview after interview has been given out by some of the officers of the Three hundred and thirty-second Regiment in condemnation of Mr. Black's charges, the widest publicity has been given to the denials; efforts have been made to belittle in every way the men who made the complaints. Following the lead of the Secretary of War, these officers of the regiment got upon their dignity and put up a defense against charges that did not apply in any particular to them. The lieutenant colonel of the regiment, who advertised himself extensively as the minister of a Baptist Church at Norwood, Ohio, was interviewed time and time again, making the statement "that nobody could call him a drunkard."

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. As I understand the gentleman's remarks, the complaints are directed to all of the officers of Company H except one lieutenant.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then the charge was against only two officers of the company.

Mr. McCULLOCH. That might be true and might not be true. A machine-gun detachment usually has two lieutenants.

Mr. CALDWELL. Had this company a machine-gun detachment?

Mr. McCULLOCH. It did; so that there were perhaps four lieutenants and one captain stationed at that point.

Think of the absurdity of such a statement, when he was stationed 800 miles away all the time from Company H. By the wildest stretch of the imagination the charges contained in Mr. Black's letter could have had no application whatever to him. Yet the reverend colonel was putting up a defense when he had no accuser, and was fleeing when no man pursued, so that when the boys came home, by the interview of the Secretary of War, to which I have referred and the interviews of the officers of the regiment, they found they were being branded as liars and slackers before the people of Ohio, because they had ventured to call attention to conditions that were not only deplorable but scandalous, and almost beyond what the imagination could conceive. Naturally, when they got home and free from Army discipline, they came to me, and they came voluntarily, giving me affidavits sustaining the charges contained in the Black letter and which affidavits contain disclosures of such a startling nature that I hesitated a long time before I decided that in justice to those boys, and in the interest of the future of the country that such things may never happen again, it was my duty to bring the facts to the attention of the House. I therefore submit affidavits of noncommissioned officers and privates of Company H, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, that tell a story of hardships—not of war but of peace—that should put to shame every man who was in a position of responsibility in connection with this matter.

In a foreign land, under the high military command of a foreign Government on an expedition of exploitation after the war was over, men who had been on the firing line, and in the front-line trenches, were starved, went half naked, were held as prisoners, and were used as the "dupes" of a foreign power to secure an advantage over friendly allies.

I shall not take the time of the House to read all of these affidavits, but I shall submit them as a part of the record and content myself by reading two affidavits, the facts in regard to which are sustained by scores of reputable, clean-cut, honorable, and truthful young men from my home town, the standing of whose families is high in the community, and who bear reputations that are beyond reproach.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Do these affidavits reflect upon the officers of Company H? Do they specifically state any act of omission or commission on the part of a named officer in Company H?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Of course they do; but, as I remember, no officer is referred to by name.

Mr. CALDWELL. Have the named officers in those affidavits had an opportunity to cross-examine witnesses?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Not before me as a tribunal.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does the gentleman think that it is fair to put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD here ex parte affidavits made by the people who made those, casting reflection upon officers of combat troops without giving those officers an opportunity to be heard?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Of course I am the one who must decide that question, and I have decided to put them in. The captain of the company was finally relieved of his command after this investigation started, on the charges made in Mr. Black's letter, but, as I understand, reinstated. Two of the lieutenants, I am informed, were afterwards relieved of their commands. On the record, therefore, and the statements that were made in the affidavits, I do not think any injustice is going to be done anyone by putting the affidavits into the RECORD.

Mr. CALDWELL. I merely called the gentleman's attention to that fact because I thought he wanted to be fair.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I am glad the gentleman did so; but I have thought about it carefully, and I have decided that no injustice would be done.

Mr. VAILE. And is it not a fact that these officers have had opportunity to be heard ever since the original disclosures were made?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Oh, yes; they have. I do not know that they have been heard before any tribunal other than a military tribunal, and of course I am not in a position to secure the detailed evidence that was developed before the military tribunal, although I have the report of the officers who made the examination, in which they state, as I remember, that these particular officers were relieved of their commands.

Mr. CALDWELL. I did not think the gentleman wanted to do anyone an injustice, and that is the only reason I called his attention to it.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Oh, no. If I thought for a minute that I would be doing anyone an injustice by putting these affidavits in the RECORD, I would not do it; but I feel that the injustice has been done the members of that company by the statements that have been made by the Secretary of War and by these officers in attempting to make it appear that the complaints they made were untrue and unfounded; and I feel, in view of the statements that have been made, from the Secretary of War down, in justice to those boys, I ought to clear this matter up, and that is what I am attempting to do. [Applause.]

The affidavits referred to are as follows:

Affidavits of members of Company H, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, sustaining charges contained in the letter of Homer E. Black, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 5, 1919.

AFFIDAVIT.

STATE OF OHIO,
Stark County, ss:

Robert H. Finefrock, being first duly sworn, says that he was a sergeant in Company H, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, United States Army, and that he was discharged from the Army on May 3, 1918.

Affiant says that he has read the letter of Homer E. Black, dated January 3, 1919, which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD February 5, 1919, by Congressman ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH and that the statements and complaints in said letter are in all particulars true.

Affiant says that while he was in the Army he kept a diary or book in which he noted certain dates and events, and that he has refreshed his recollection by reference to that book in the preparation of the following affidavit.

Affiant says that while his company, Company H, was in France, that the food was satisfactory but that the men were underfed from October 28, 1918, at the beginning of the drive until March 9, 1919, at which date we arrived at Genoa. The company started on October 28, 1918, on the drive from Treviso, advancing that night as far as Varago, where they remained for two days. Affiant says that they then moved across the Piave River; that they kept advancing on this drive with an engagement at the Tagiamento River until November 6, 1918; that on November 6 they moved up to the point of the Austrian retreat at the time of the signing of the armistice on November 11, 1918, where they remained until they were ordered to prepare to go to Cattaro; that they reached Venice on November 16 and that the same evening they went abroad the Austrian transport Argentina. Affiant says that this ship was in such a filthy and insanitary condition that the men were immediately covered with vermin; that the food given the men on the trip from Venice to Cattaro on this boat was scarce and hardly fit to eat; that the men received coffee, hardtack, and macaroni, together with cans of bully beef, and that he saw upon the cans dates as far back as 1911, which indicated to him that the beef had been canned in that year; that one can of bully beef would be issued to three men for one meal, and if the can happened to be spoiled, as many of them were, the men were simply "out of luck" and did not have any meat to eat at all. Affiant further says that while the men were being fed on the rations herein referred to, which were insufficient, and all of them went hungry all of the time, the officers had plenty to eat and were being fed upon the best of food, including turkey and many delicacies, according to affiant's certain knowledge. Affiant says that he saw after every meal the men line up in front of the window of the kitchen where the meals of the officers and the crew were prepared and fight and scramble to secure the leavings from the meals of these officers.

Affiant says that the facts are that on this trip the men did not have sufficient food and that they went hungry and that the officers were well fed; that the men were so hungry that they were willing to eat the leavings from the tables of the officers.

Affiant says that after the company arrived at Cattaro, Dalmatia, the men were billeted in a stone warehouse; that the majority of the men slept on the hard floor; that about a month before the company left Cattaro a small amount of straw was brought for the use of the men, but there was not enough to go around and a large number of men slept on the hard floor during their entire stay at Cattaro, which was from the 23d of November, 1918, until the 5th of March, 1919.

FOOD.

Affiant says that his Company H was put on Italian rations furnished by Italians, and that the food furnished the men while Company H was at Cattaro up until the time of the investigation that was made following the complaints made in Mr. Black's letter was insufficient and of such poor quality that it was not fit to eat; that the rations consisted of cornmeal which was moldy, rice that was musty and wormy, and macaroni that was full of worms and bugs; that worms could be seen in the rice and macaroni after it was cooked and as it was being served to the men. Affiant says that the coffee was of such an inferior grade that it was hardly fit to drink, and that for days at a time they had no coffee at all. Affiant further says that the cattle which were killed for the use of the commissary of his company were not in a fit condition to be used for human food, and that he was informed that many of the cattle had sores on the legs that indicated that they were suffering from some kind of a disease, and says that one of his sentries reported that a beef that had died on its feet during the night was quartered by the Italians the next morning and taken to the commissary from which Company H drew their rations. Affiant says that for over a month the food cooked was not seasoned in any way, and that for many days they were without any salt. Affiant was informed by the baker of the company that the flour was wormy, and that the bakers would spend as much as an hour a day picking worms out of the flour before using it, and that it was not until January 12, 1919, that white bread was first issued to the company.

Affiant says that while he has no direct knowledge upon the subject, yet it was common talk among the men that they were being fed upon horse meat, and that some of his men told him they had seen horses quartered and sent to the commissary of the company by the Italians who were furnishing the Italian rations upon which the men of the company were being fed.

CLOTHING.

Affiant says that at the end of the drive on November 12, the day after the signing of the armistice, the men of Company H had only the clothing that they had on their backs, and there was no clothing issued to the men from that date until about four weeks before the men sailed for Genoa on March 5. Affiant says that the facts are there were no clothes issued to the men covering a period of about three months, during which time they went through all of these hardships, including their marches and their stay at Cattaro; that the result was that toward the end of that time they were going half-naked, and the men were ashamed to go out in public because of the condition of their clothes, which were so torn and ragged that they would not cover their nakedness.

Affiant says further that he saw American soldiers wearing Austrian clothing which they had gathered up and washed and put in condition and were worn by them; that one man in the company whose clothes became in such bad condition was compelled to go around in a blanket for two days until he washed and dried his uniform. Affiant says that the shoes of the men were in such bad condition that the soles were out and their feet were on the ground, and still they were compelled to do guard duty and drill in all kinds of weather.

TREATMENT.

Affiant says that there was not a proper place for taking care of sick soldiers; that on the trip from Venice to Cattaro a number of the soldiers became ill; that it was believed that they had the influenza, and they remained on the transport in all of its filth for a number of days after they landed at Cattaro; that finally when the boat was taken away these men were ordered off of the boat, and they walked through rain and mud, sick as they were, to the billets, which were in the stone warehouse where the company was quartered, and they laid there for two days before they were taken to the hospital. Affiant says that on the arrival of the transport at Cattaro the entire Company H was confined to billets and the drill yard for a period of 10 days, and the men were not permitted to go over town to take a bath; having been transported in that filthy boat and the men being covered with vermin, they were still held for 10 days without any apparent excuse, not being permitted to go where they could clean up and take a bath.

DRUNKENNESS.

Affiant says that the statement made in the letter of Homer E. Black, dated January 3, 1919, hereinbefore referred to, that "Another complaint is that all the commissioned officers located at this point, with the exception of one lieutenant, are drinking to excess and drunk practically all of the time; that their actions are so disgusting and disgraceful that the officers of the English, French, and Italian Armies look down upon them with disgust," is true. Affiant says there were five commissioned officers in Company H, stationed at Cattaro, and that four, including the captain, drank to excess, and that the captain was drunk a good part of the time. Affiant says that one of the lieutenants, as far as he knows, did not drink at all. Affiant says that the first evidence of drinking upon the part of the commissioned officers of Company H was at Foulain, France, on June 20, 1918; that the company had arrived at this point and were to be billeted, according to the captain's instructions, in private homes; that the men waited for about three hours for the proper arrangements to be made, and finally the captain of the company marched the company up the street to a saloon; that the captain and the lieutenant went into the saloon and remained there for fully an hour, leaving the men in the company standing outside of the saloon in the rain. Affiant says that he saw the captain of Company H so intoxicated that he did not know one of the corporals of his own company.

Affiant says that the captain finally, instead of billeting the men in private homes, crowded them into one room next to the saloon, and those who could not crowd into the room were compelled to sleep outside in the rain or in sheds or wherever they could get shelter.

Affiant says that when the company arrived at Valeggio, Italy, on August 13, 1918, the regiment was assembled for the first time after arriving in Italy; that here they had built a large building, which was dedicated on Saturday evening, August 31, 1918. Affiant says that just a week previous to this time an order signed by the colonel was issued that no liquor would be allowed brought into camp, and that at the dedication of this building beer and liquor were hauled in by the truck load, and nobody was allowed at this affair except the officers. In other words, affiant says that the orders that were issued that no liquor or beer should be brought in seemed to apply only to the men, and when it came to a party for the officers it had absolutely no application, because they did drink liquor and beer brought in by the truck load for this officers' party.

Affiant further says that the affair was given exclusively for officers on that Saturday night, August 31; that it was a very lively party; and that it lasted until 2 o'clock in the morning. Affiant says that he saw officers coming and going from the party in a drunken condition; that the language used was rough and profane; that the colonel of the regiment himself was there. Affiant says that he knows positively that this party was attended by Lieut. Col. Everson, but affiant can not say that he drank anything; but affiant does know that Lieut. Col. Everson was present, and there were officers under him present at this party, whom he could have disciplined for their conduct and their drinking had he desired to do so. Affiant knows that officers who were under Lieut. Col. Everson did drink to excess on this occasion. Affiant says that on October 19, 1918, Company H started on what was known as a propaganda march; that on this occasion the captain of Company H, who was in command, was so intoxicated that he got off of the road time and time again, leading his men around to no purpose, and while he was in an intoxicated condition. The facts are, affiant says, because of his condition and the way he commanded our company on that day it took Company H two hours longer to cover the same ground than it did Company F. Affiant says that on October 29, 1918, while the company was on the drive, they arrived at Varago; that the first two lieutenants and the captain had been drinking all day and were drinking during the evening, and by reason of their condition they did not secure the issue of rations for supper for the men until 10 o'clock at night, and the failure to secure the rations for supper was, in affiant's opinion, due to the drunken condition of the officers in command of the company.

Affiant says that while the company was at Venice preparatory to going aboard the transport Argentina for Cattaro, on November 16, one of the first lieutenants of Company H went aboard a Canadian transport and got so drunk that he staggered coming off the transport in full sight and in the presence of the men of the company. Affiant says that on January 25 one of the first lieutenants was picked up out of the ditch in an intoxicated condition by two privates of Company H; that on January 25, 1919, at Cattaro, a party was given at the officers' quarters for officers of the Army and Navy only, and affiant saw some of these officers later in the evening at a party given by the boys of the Army and Navy at the coffee house in Cattaro in such a drunken condition that they were upon the stage where the performance was being held interfering with the program until the sergeant ordered them to stand back. Affiant says that among the officers who came to the coffee house in this drunken condition was the captain and one of the first lieutenants of Company H. Affiant says that they were both in a drunken condition; that two lieutenants of the machine-gun company were drinking and interfering with the performance.

Affiant says that on January 14, 1919, the captain of Company H was found sitting on the dock at Cattaro in a drunken stupor at 5 o'clock in the morning, and an ambulance driver, Mechanic Reinhart, was called to take the captain to his quarters in his ambulance.

Affiant says that he also knows of the trouble Sergt. Schauers, of his company, had with the naval officer who attended the officers' party at Cattaro and who was intoxicated at the party on January 25, 1919, and he saw the lump on the sergeant's face where he had been struck by this officer at the time of the disturbance at the officers' party at the officers' quarters, where officers were drinking to excess.

Affiant says that two of the members of the machine-gun company were injured in an accident by the bursting of a 1-pounder shell, and that they died of such injuries; that the boys were Pvt. Grinly, who was buried on December 23, 1918, and Corpl. Brickman, buried on December 24, 1918; that at both of these funerals, which were military funerals, the captain of our company was intoxicated; that at the funeral of Corpl. Brickman the actions of the captain of Company H were so disgusting and disgraceful that the officers of the French Army who attended the funeral turned away from the captain in disgust and refused to talk with him. Affiant says that he stood next to the captain during the ceremonies and that he was giving orders and interfering with the ceremonies in such a way as to disgust the entire company, and affiant knows that he was intoxicated and his actions were disgraceful.

Affiant says that the Serbia commissary offered to issue wine to the men in Company H; that the captain of Company H refused to permit the men to receive the wine, and the next day he sent men to the Serbia commissary with a keg to get the wine, which they did get and delivered to the officers' quarters.

Affiant says that the commander of the regiment, Col. Wallace, and the lieutenant colonel, Everson, were at the regimental headquarters, which was a considerable part of the time at Genoa and probably for a short time at Treviso; that they were at least 800 miles away from Cattaro, where Company H was billeted. Affiant further says that Lieut. Col. Everson visited Company H at Cattaro on two occasions only, and that the commander of the regiment visited Company H at Cattaro only once.

Affiant says that the reference in a report of the War Department that the clothes of the soldiers at Cattaro were badly torn due to the unloading of ammunition from Austrian captured ships and marching over the mountains at Montenegro, do not pertain to Company H, about which complaints were made, because Company H never unloaded any ammunition nor ever marched over the mountains.

Affiant says that on March 4, 1919, the night before they sailed for Genoa, Lieut. Col. Everson, who had not visited Cattaro except on one occasion before that time, made a speech to the men of Company H in regard to the complaints contained in the letter of Mr. Black; that he said that Mr. Black was a man "just a little bit over the draft age and a slacker"; that he had received letters from these boys and sent them to Washington to Congressman ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH, and that Congressman MCCULLOCH presented the complaints to Congress; that during the course of his remarks he said that "ROSCOE MCCULLOCH is a liar"; that during the course of his remarks Lieut. Col. Everson said "you men want to be mighty careful what you say in this investigation or you will be sent to France in a working battalion."

Affiant says that during the time that the members of Company H were on such poor Italian rations that he ate with the Italian Army, and that their rations were not only good but that the quantity was sufficient; that they had food of good quality and plenty of it; that the members of Company H could not get any sugar, but the Italians had their coffee sweetened. Affiant says that it was common knowledge and repeatedly stated that the Italian Army was receiving American corned beef canned in 1917, while the American soldiers were compelled to eat Italian canned bully beef canned as far back as 1911. Affiant says that the soldiers were not paid regularly, and that at one time there was as much as three months' pay due them.

Affiant says that the investigation that was conducted of the complaints contained in the Black letter was not a fair investigation in the opinion of affiant, for the reason that it appeared that the officers were attempting to exonerate the officers of Company H and other officers rather than to get the facts; that the investigation was not started until March 17, 1919, and affiant says that he saw clippings from newspapers sent to the boys from the States announcing that the investigation had been made and that the complaints had been found to be false, when in truth and in fact at that time no investigation whatsoever to affiant's knowledge had been made.

Affiant says that he wrote no letter of complaint home about conditions while he was in the service; that he is making this affidavit on his own motion and for the purpose alone of seeing that justice is done; that none of the complaints contained in the Black letters were his complaints, for he wrote no one upon the subject.

Affiant says that after the investigation which resulted from complaints presented to Congress by Congressman ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH conditions immediately improved, and that they were at once placed upon American rations; that clothes were at once issued to the men; that sufficient and proper food was supplied; and that conditions generally were very much improved and that the men without exception were grateful for the improved conditions.

Adam T. Van Horn, being first duly sworn, says that he was a duty sergeant in Company H, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, United States Army, and that he was discharged from the Army on May 3, 1919.

Affiant says that he has read the letter of Homer E. Black, dated January 3, 1919, which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD February 5, 1919, by Congressman ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH, and that the statements and complaints contained in that letter are true.

Affiant says that he was with Company H during his entire service in the Army, which covered a period from September 6, 1917, until May 3, 1919; that he participated in the drive in which the company engaged, and that to his knowledge no complaints were made by the men as to conditions before the signing of the armistice although the men did go through great hardships. Affiant says that after the signing of the armistice Company H with its unit was ordered to Dalmatia and Company H to Cattaro; that the company reached Venice about November 16 and embarked on the Austrian transport Argentina for Cattaro. The transport Argentina was an Austrian hospital ship being sailed by the Italian Government flying the Italian flag; that this ship had been used to transport Austrian prisoners. The part of the ship occupied by affiant and the other members of Company H was in an unsanitary and filthy condition and the men, many of them, became covered with vermin, and the ship was not a fit place for men to stay. On this trip which lasted about six days the food was not only insufficient but of such a poor quality that the men would not eat it. Those who had money bought food from the crew's kitchen. Those who did not have money made an effort to get food the best way they could from the crew's kitchen. Many of the men traded their tobacco for bread. The rations were what were known as Italian iron rations, which is a ration that is only supposed to be used in extreme emergency. It consisted of one can of bully beef to three men, and one piece of hardtack to each man. If the can happened to be spoiled the men were "out of luck" and would have no meat to eat for that meal. As a good deal of this meat was put up in 1912, and so marked on the can, a great deal of it was spoiled. The facts are the men did not have enough to eat and went hungry.

Affiant says that at the arrival at Cattaro the company was billeted in a warehouse with a drill field, and that the company was immediately ordered confined to billets and the drill field. Affiant says that during their say at Cattaro, which covered a period of about three months, almost 80 per cent of the time the company was confined to the billets and the drill field or what is referred to in the Army as the company area. The effect of this was that the men were confined just as though they were prisoners, no passes being issued to leave the company area or to go to town for any purpose.

The warehouse in which the company was billeted was not provided with cots or beds and the men slept on the hard floor except only when they were able to rig up a cot or a bed for themselves; that there was no straw until about a month before the company left, and then there was not a third enough to go around. Affiant says that a unit of the French Army was billeted at Cattaro, arriving three weeks after Company H arrived, and they were provided in their billets with iron cots with springs and had very comfortable quarters, while Company H was sleeping on the hard floor and apparently no effort was being made whatever on the part of the officers to remedy conditions. The men learned that these cots were available and in the Serbian warehouse, and when some of the men tried to get them they were ordered by their officers not do so and were forbidden to enter any warehouse for any purpose whatever.

Affiant says that the food prior to the investigation that was made following the complaints contained in the Black letter consisted of Italian rations furnished by Italians to the company's commissary and was not only insufficient in quantity but was so poor in quality that in affiant's opinion it was not fit to eat. Affiant says that at one time there was an inspector from the Medical Department inspected the food, and it was reported that he condemned it and so reported, but there seemed to be no improvement until the investigation was made on the complaints made in the Black letter. The food consisted of wormy rice and macaroni; that the corn meal was moldy that was furnished the commissary by the Italians. Affiant says that the meat that was served to the men was of such a quality that he could not eat it and did not eat it. Affiant will say that he did not touch meat more than once or twice when he was at Cattaro and then only for the purpose of finding out how it tasted. The men of Company H at Cattaro heard on a Saturday night that an investigatioin had been started investigating conditions, and on the following Wednesday night an English ship came in with American rations. Affiant says that he is confident that the American rations were furnished because of the investigation that was made, and he learned from the captain of the ship that brought the American rations that they had been loaded onto this transport in a hurry, having been carried on the upper deck. Those were the first American rations that the men of Company H had since they had arrived at Cattaro, and from that time on conditions improved.

Affiant says that the men wore the same clothes to Cattaro that they had worn on the drive and through the whole campaign, and for a number of months after arriving at Cattaro the clothes were in such a torn and ragged condition that the men went about with their overcoats and raincoats on in order to cover themselves; and they were ashamed, many of them, to be seen in public because of the condition of their clothes; that on a number of occasions affiant transferred sentries who were doing guard duty from a post that was more or less public to one where they were less likely to be seen, and he was compelled to do this because the men were ashamed to be seen by other people on account of the ragged condition of their clothing. Affiant says that he was ordered by the commissioned officers to keep these men with ragged clothes out of the sight of the public. Affiant says that the shoes of the men were in such bad condition that many of them were walking on the ground in their bare feet. The roads were made of limestone, and the shoes were very quickly worn out. Affiant says that in his opinion there was absolutely no excuse for the men being without clothes, for the reason that there were plenty of clothes for the men at squadros at Treviso, but the officers of the battalion ordered that the overcoat and blanket be taken out of the squadro and brought to the men, leaving all their other clothes in the squadros at Treviso. If they had brought the squadros to the men, they would have had clothes.

Affiant says that the first time that he observed any drinking upon the part of officers was at Foulain, France, and the captain of the company marched the men up in front of a saloon and left them stand out in the rain while he remained in the saloon for a period of about three hours. During that time the captain came out of the saloon, and affiant talked with him and was close enough to him to observe that he had been drinking. Affiant says that the captain said each squad could send one canteen into the saloon for wine. The men stood out in the rain in front of the saloon until about 10 o'clock at night when the men were advised that they might seek shelter, which the men did wherever they could get it, some going to the station, some to the freight house, some slept under an arbor, etc.

Affiant says that he was on special duty one night at Valeggio when there was an officers' party given. Affiant says there was a great quantity of all kinds of liquors served at this party, and affiant says that he observed personally many of the officers in an intoxicated condition. Affiant says that while the company was on the front-line trench B–2 Varago, while he was on the line on duty having charge of a subsector, or a part of a sector, the captain of the company was in an intoxicated condition and was issuing absurd and foolish orders, making himself generally ridiculous and making it hard and uncomfortable for the sentries that were on duty. Affiant says that he knows that the captain was getting liquor during this crucial time, for the ration truck was bringing liquor to him.

Affiant says that the captain of the company was drinking continuously while the company was stationed at Cattaro; that liquor was furnished and taken to the officers' quarters; that liquor was taken to these quarters in various quantities; and the affiant saw the captain of the company and three of the lieutenants at various times in an intoxicated condition. Affiant says that the statements contained in the letter of Homer E. Black in regard to the drinking of officers of Company H is true. Affiant says that while the officers were drinking and using intoxicating liquors that if the men used intoxicating liquors to excess and were caught that they would be punished. Affiant says that, in his opinion, the men of Company H suffered hardships that they would not have been compelled to suffer had it not been for the fact that the captain of the company and other officers of the company used intoxicating liquors to excess. Affiant says that the investigation that was conducted was, in his opinion, not conducted in such a way as to get the facts, but was more for the purpose of exonerating the officers than to secure the truth. Affiant says that the inspector in charge of the investigation practically admitted the truth of the statements and complaints that were made in regard to food and clothing, because he gave excuses for the conditions that existed in regard to food and clothing.

Joseph R. Colle, being first duly sworn, says that he was a platoon sergeant in Company H, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, United States Army, and that he was discharged from the Army on May 3, 1919.

Affiant says that he has read the letter of Homer E. Black, dated January 3, 1919, which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD February 5, 1919, by Congressman ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH, and that the statements and complaints in said letter are true.

Affiant says that he was present when the affidavit of Adam T. Van Horn, formerly a sergeant of Company H, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, was dictated, and that he has since read said affidavit, and that the facts and statements contained in said affidavit are true.

Affiant says that he was assigned to duty during most of the time that Company H was stationed at Cattaro as sergeant of the military police; that as such officer (noncommissioned) he had the privilege of coming and going between the company area and the walled city of Cattaro. Affiant says that he would be in the town of Cattaro most all of the day and part of the night; that there was a store known as the bakery where liquor was sold; that almost every day affiant saw the captain with one of his lieutenants or perhaps two lieutenants in this bakery drinking liquor. Affiant says that he has seen in this bakery the captain of the company, all of the lieutenants of the company except Lieut. Brown, the two lieutenants of the machine-gun company, and the battalion adjutant in this bakery at various times. Affiant says that he has seen the captain, the three lieutenants of Company H, and the two lieutenants of the machine-gun company on the streets of Cattaro in an intoxicated condition, and that said officers did drink to excess.

Affiant says that he had four of his men—military police—at an Army and Navy party given in what was known as the coffee house, and that on this occasion most all of the officers attending this party were under the influence of liquor; that on that occasion affiant saw in an intoxicated condition at this party the captain, two lieutenants of Company H, and two lieutenants of the machine-gun company, and naval officers in an intoxicated condition.

On one evening affiant says that he heard of a disturbance and on investigating he found two Serbians leading the captain of Company H out of the walled city toward his quarters in such a drunken condition he could not walk without being assisted.

Edward A. Schauer, being first duly sworn, says that he was a sergeant in Company H of the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, United States Army.

Affiant says that he has read carefully the letter written by Homer E. Black dated January 3, 1919, to Congressman ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH, in which reference is made to complaints in regard to the food, clothing, and treatment of soldiers in Company H, Second Battalion, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, and that the statements and complaints contained in that letter are true.

Affiant says that Company H, with the battalion of the regiment, was transported from Venice to Cattaro on the captured Austrian transport Argentina. This ship was filthy and insanitary, and the men, as a result of the filthy condition of the ship, were at once covered with vermin.

Affiant says that the men were served with canned Italian bully beef, the cans—some of them—marked "1912," indicating the beef had been canned in that year. In many instances the beef was spoiled and the men would have to throw half of it away. The rations was one can of bully beef to three men, which would be about an ounce and a third of beef to a man, and each man would get one piece of hard-tack. Hot coffee was never served more than once a day. The facts are the food served upon this trip, which covered a period of six days, was insufficient and of such a poor quality that a large part of it was not fit to eat and the men went hungry. Affiant says that he himself, with the other men, has waited for the leavings or left overs from the mess tables of the crew and the officers in order to get something additional to eat to satisfy his hunger. Affiant says that while the men were being improperly and insufficiently fed it was common knowledge among them that the officers on the upper deck had plenty to eat, including turkey and other delicacies.

Affiant says that when the company arrived at Cattaro they were billeted in a warehouse. The men had to sleep upon the floor. The men tried to work out some way of preparing beds, and did the very best they could, and there was not even straw furnished until the last few weeks, and there was not enough to go around, and during this time French and Serbian troops who were billeted in Cattaro had beds and proper quarters and plenty of room.

Affiant says that the food at Cattaro before the investigation was made consisted of Italian rations. The rice furnished was buggy and moldy and the macaroni was full of worms. The food was seldom ever seasoned. Affiant says that the meat furnished the men was of such a quality that he could not eat it; that it had a bad odor about it and turned his stomach. Affiant says that, in his opinion, the meat furnished the men was not fit to eat.

Affiant says that the men before the investigation in many instances did not have sufficient clothes. The clothes were out at the knees and so ragged and torn that they would not cover their nakedness and were compelled to wear overcoats when they would go out in public because of the condition of their clothes. Affiant says the shoes of the men were so worn that many times he was compelled to excuse them from guard duty because their feet were on the ground. Affiant says that the bathing facilities were absolutely inadequate and that men were compelled to go a long time without a bath.

Affiant says that there were five officers in Company H, commissioned—the captain, two first lieutenants, and two second lieutenants. Affiant says that all of these officers except one second lieutenant drank to excess and were most of the time under the influence of liquor. Affiant says that he saw one of the officers of Company H, on the occasion of the funeral of one of the boys who had been killed by accident, approach two French officers and attempted to talk to them, and these officers turned away in disgust because he was in such a drunken condition that his actions were disgusting. The actions of this officer during the entire ceremonies of the funeral because of his drunken condition were disgusting to everybody. Affiant says that on one occasion a party was given by the Army and Navy officers located at Cattaro. This party was given on January 25, 1919. Affiant says that he was informed by one of the officers that the purposes of the party or the object of the party was to get the Navy officers drunk; that this officer described to affiant what was known as "the boat race," and he said that the Army sat on one side of the table and the Navy on the other; that each man had his glass upside down and they started a bottle on each side of the table; that each man was to fill his glass, drink it, and turn it upside down and then the next man was to do the same; that whichever side finished first won the race. Affiant says that at this party he was informed by the officer that this was one of the amusements. On this day and during this evening affiant was sergeant of the guard, and at about 10 o'clock he was informed that there was a disturbance at the Company H officers' quarters. Affiant went to the quarters and there found that a naval officer was in a drunken condition and had attempted to enter a woman's room and was creating a disturbance when affiant, as was his duty, approached this officer, he struck him in his face with his fist. And although this act on the part of this naval officer was contrary to regulations and should have been investigated, yet the officers covered the matter up and smothered it and no investigation was made. It was commonly understood and common talk that most of the officers who attended this party drank to excess and were drunk. Affiant says that there were other parties where officers were drinking and to excess. And affiant says that the charges made in Mr. Black's letter in regard to drinking among the officers are true.

Affiant says that members of Company H received word from home that the announcement had been made through the newspapers that the charges made by Mr. Black had been investigated and found to be untrue, and at the time those letters were received the investigation of Company H had not begun, and affiant knows that the first investigation was started March 17, 1919. Affiant says that the nature of the investigation as conducted seemed to him to be an effort to exonerate officers rather than to get the facts.

Schauer, and that he has since read it carefully, and that the facts and statements contained in that affidavit are, to affiant's knowledge, true in every particular. Affiant says that he was a corporal in Company H, of the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, United States Army, and that he was with the company during its entire foreign service. Affiant says that during the trip from Venice to Cattaro, on the transport Argentina, that he himself fought with other men for the bones and leavings from the mess; that he did this because he was so hungry that he was willing to do most anything to secure food. Affiant says that the truth is that the men were almost crazed for food and were willing to do most anything to get something to eat. Affiant says that while the men were in this condition and without sufficient food that the officers on the upper deck were being feed on turkey and other delicacies and had plenty to eat.

Affiant says that the statements that have been made that the commissioned officers of Company H, with the exception of one lieutenant, drank to excess and were drunk a great part of the time are true.

R. W. Shurtz, being sworn, says that he was a member of Company H, of the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, being a private; that the company, with other companies of the regiment, were transported from Venice to Cattaro on the Italian transport Argentina; that this transport had carried to the Venice port Italian prisoners from an Austrian port; that before the American soldiers went aboard the ship the Italian authorities desired to clean and sterilize the ship. For some reason unknown to affiant the colonel of the regiment declined to have this done and insisted on leaving at once. This information came to affiant by the Italian in charge of the ship. In any event, the companies did go aboard without the ship being cleaned. Affiant says that the ship was in such a filthy condition that the men were at once covered with vermin and that the hold in the ship where they were was not a fit place for any person to stay.

Affiant says that during this trip, which lasted about six days, the rations were very poor. The general run of the rations would be one can of corned beef to three men and one piece of hardtack to each man. It became somewhat of a joke among the men as to the age of the corned beef because of the date on the can, some of which ran back as far as 1907. These rations remained about the same during the entire trip so far as the privates and enlisted men were concerned.

Affiant says that on one occasion he was assigned to guard duty where he had an opportunity to observe the kind of rations and food that was being served during this same trip to the officers of the regiment on the boat; that he saw supplies of dressed turkeys, dressed chickens, steaks, potatoes, and good bread. Affiant says that he saw these supplies being cooked and served to the officers upon the boat at the same time that the men were on the rations above referred to. It was common knowledge and common talk among the men on this boat that during this trip liquors were being served and used freely by the officers, who were on the upper deck, and affiant says that he was told by reliable persons that there was a great deal of drinking going on among the officers on this trip.

Affiant says that after the battalion arrived at Cattaro the conditions in regard to food and clothing were extremely bad; that the soldiers did not have sufficient clothing to cover themselves; that the men were covered with vermin, which they were unable to get rid of for about three months, and that the lack of clothing increased the discomforts resulting from this condition. Affiant says that he has seen men going about with clothes that were so badly worn and torn that it caused comments from the natives living at Cattaro, who were as ragged a set of people as affiant had ever seen, and even they were commenting upon the clothes of the American soldiers. Some time later there was a part issue of clothes made to the soldiers, which improved conditions considerably. Soldiers who were compelled to be out on guard duty during warm days were forced to wear their overcoat in order to cover their nakedness.

Affiant says that the food furnished at Cattaro was for a considerable time known as Italian rations, which consisted of macaroni, spaghetti, beef, sometimes cheese, and very often there was no coffee. Affiant says that the macaroni that was served was of such a poor quality that he has seen the cooks wash the macaroni to take out worms and bugs that it contained, and when they could get no more of the bugs and worms out by washing they cooked it and served it to the men—bugs, worms, and all. Affiant says that the beef that was served was, to his knowledge, in some instances not fit to be served, for the reason that he himself saw cattle which were brought to the commissary and killed and fed to the soldiers have what in the opinion of affiant was hoof-and-mouth disease. He has seen cattle taken off of the boat which were afterwards killed with sores on their hoofs and legs that proved to affiant that the cattle were afflicted with some serious disease.

Affiant says that rum was a part of the Italian rations and that to his knowledge it was served to the officers at mess and at other times. The men were entitled, under the Italian rations, to an issue of wine, but on an order of the officers the men were not permitted to have it. Affiant says that he knows that there were many officers that did drink to excess; that there were to affiant's knowledge a number of parties given to officers and attended exclusively by officers where they drank to excess. Affiant can call attention to two specific instances among others. One was at Vallegeio. A building was to be dedicated and arrangements were to be made for a show to be given by the talent of the regiment; the first night, which was a Saturday night, was to be exclusively for the officers, and the following Monday night was to be for the privates. This building where the show was held was right near affiant's tent, and he was able to observe all that went on. Affiant says that on this occasion, in his opinion, everyone who attended the affair drank to excess and were drunk; that they had an unlimited amount of all kinds of liquor, including champagne. It was a very lively party. Affiant saw the officers leaving the show in such a drunken condition that they were leaning on one another's shoulders and unable to walk straight. The other occasion was at Cattaro, where a party was given by Serbian officers, attended by American officers, and to affiant's knowledge many of the officers drank to excess.

Robert T. Smith, being first duly sworn, says that he was a sergeant in Company H, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry. Affiant says that he has read the charges that were contained in the letter sent to Congressman ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH by Homer E. Black, which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and which resulted in an investigation of conditions in connection with Company H and other companies of the Three hundred and thirty-second. The complaint that the soldiers were fed on Italian rations and did not receive sufficient food are true. The meat was bad, the mush was moldy, and soldiers could pick worms out of the rice that was being served. Affiant says he knows that this is true, because he had such rations served to him and that he did himself pick worms out of the rice.

Affiant says that the complaint that no clothes of any kind were received for a number of months before the complaints were filed and that the men were compelled to wear clothes that were ragged and torn to such an extent that in many instances they would not cover their nakedness to the extent that the seat of the breeches were out and shirts were torn, and men were ashamed to appear in public in the clothes. While this is not true of all the men, yet the majority of them were in this condition. Being a first sergeant, I was able to secure clothes for myself, and I gave some clothes that I had to men whose clothes were not fit to wear. The clothes that I had I brought with me, and clothes were not available at that point for distribution to the men.

In regard to the complaint about officers drinking, affiant has this to say: It was common knowledge that at times the officers were drinking to excess. Affiant can not say that this was occurring all of the time, but he does know that liquor was used by the officers, and it was the common opinion among the men that it was used all the time. Affiant says that on one occasion he went to a building where a party had been given by officers and he saw conditions that convinced him that there had been a great deal of drinking going on, and he was informed by men who had been about the building when the party was on that the officers had been drinking to excess; that the colonel of the regiment had made a number of drunken speeches. Affiant says that one lieutenant was sent over to the building while affiant was there for wine for the colonel, and he saw this lieutenant and some of the men picking up the bottles that were sitting around with some liquor in them, and they secured in this way a bottle of wine, which the lieutenant said he intended to take to the colonel. Affiant says that the lieutenant referred to was very drunk at the time.

Affiant says that the conditions were bad and that in his opinion the investigation made was not only justifiable but necessary. Affiant says that after the investigation started conditions immediately improved and that the men had practically everything that could be asked for.

Affiant further says that on the transport between Venice and Cattaro the men were served one can of bully beef to three men with one piece of hardtack each; that he saw marked on the can the date 1911, which indicated that the beef had been canned during that year. Affiant says that he saw on that trip while the men were being fed with the rations referred to that the officers had turkey, duck, and other delicacies. Affiant says that on one occasion he conferred with a lieutenant while he was at dinner, and he saw that the officers were being served the very finest meal; that they had celery and many other delicacies. During this time the men were on the rations above referred to.

William D. Reinhart, being first duly sworn, says that he was a mechanic and a member of Company H, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, United States Army; that he has just been discharged.

Affiant's company was transported with other companies of the regiment from Venice to Cattaro in the transport Argentina. Affiant says that the hold of the ship where the men stayed was in a terribly filthy condition and that the men became covered with vermin; that the food on the trip which lasted about six days was very scarce and very poor. One can of corned beef was given to three men, each man receiving a piece of hardtack at a meal and one warm meal being served each man each day. Affiant says that he saw the dates 1902 and on up on the cans which indicated to him that the beef had been canned in those years. Very often the meat in the cans was spoiled.

Affiant says that during their say at Cattaro and before the investigation started that the soldiers were fed on Italian rations and did not receive sufficient food; that the food they did receive was of such a poor quality that the rice and macaroni contained worms and bugs and the meat in affiant's knowledge was not fit to eat. Affiant says that he saw cattle brought in for slaughter, the meat of which was served to the men, which cattle had running sores between the hoof and the knee, which indicated clearly to affiant that the cattle were suffering from some kind of a disease. For a period of about three weeks we had neither sugar, salt, nor pepper. The flour and corn meal which we were furnished was so moldy that it could scarcely be eaten.

Affiant says that for a number of weeks prior to the investigation the men's clothes were in very bad condition; that they were torn and in such a ragged condition that many of the men could not go out in public without wearing an overcoat or covering themselves up with a blanket.

Affiant says that while at Cattaro he drove a Ford ambulance, and on one occasion the officers had a party at the hotel, and affiant states that he was called out of bed at 5 o'clock in the morning by the corporal of the guard to take one drunken officer to his quarters. Affiant also knows from his own knowledge that two of the four lieutenants of the company were drinking to excess.

Affiant says that on one occasion there was a party given at the coffee house at Cattaro; that wine was served; that all of the officers except one lieutenant were drunk. Affiant says that drinking among the officers was general, with few exceptions, and that the facts as above stated in regard to drinking were true.

Affiant says that he has read the charges contained in the letter of Homer E. Black addressed to Congressman MCCULLOCH, and that the charges set out in that letter are, in his opinion, true in every particular.

Sergt. C. H. Orton, being first duly sworn, says that he was mess sergeant of Company H, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry; that because of his position he was able to observe the kind of food that was available and being served to the soldiers of the company. In the first place, for at least the first two months while in Cattaro, Dalmatia, we drew from the Italian commissary of that city the following articles: Beef, bread, macaroni, rice, coffee, cheese, tomato sauce, salt, and sugar, and occasionally an Italian red bean.

For a period of at least two months we drew no potatoes, having available only those which we secured from the Montenegros. The beef was of a poor quality, frozen beef being obtainable only the last few weeks of our stay in that city. The beef was thin and scrawny and freshly killed. In fact, there were times in which we would wait with our truck until the beef was butchered. This fact can be verified by a medical major who visited Cattaro in company with the food commission, and who examined the beef on hand at that time and investigated general food conditions. The macaroni and rice were wormy and buggy a large part of the time. In fact, the rice was of such a bad condition that when at one time Capt. Wallace W. Johns, of Company H, accompanied the writer to the Italian commissary with a view to picking out a sack of rice which was not wormy, after examining four sacks of rice selected from different parts of the warehouse, all of which were buggy and wormy, the captain instructed the writer to simply take any which was issued and trade it off for something the men could eat.

The combined periods of time we were entirely without sugar totaled at least 19 days, and we were left on our own resources to secure sugar by trading food for honey or sugar, in case either was obtainable at that particular time. We were at times without coffee for periods which I would judge would total about 7 days.

Our bread at first was made of wheat flour and, I judge, at least 40 per cent corn meal.

Our baker told me that they spent a period of time each day picking worms out of the flour before making up the bread, and the corn meal was always musty. After the arrival of the United States flour ship our bread was of a good quality, the date for which can no doubt be ascertained, and at some time, which I believe to be in February, we received a quantity of American rations, which remedied conditions considerably. In fact, the last month that we were in the city of Cattaro the men were very well satisfied with the food obtained.

In regard to clothing conditions the writer merely wishes to make the statement that he personally went around the first month or so in the city of Cattaro with holes clear through both soles of his shoes at least the size of a dollar. There were many others of the company whose clothes were in very bad condition; in fact, some of them had to wear overcoats when on guard to hide the true condition of their clothes. Other matters in regard to clothing can be ascertained from Sergt. Richardson, supply sergeant of Company H, and a resident of Canton, Ohio.

G. S. Schneider, being sworn, says that he was a member of Company H, of the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry; that for a considerable time this company was stationed at Cattaro, Dalmatia, Austria; that he was a corporal in said company; that for a considerable time the food issued and served to the members of the company was very poor; the company was on what is known as Italian rations; that he saw at various times worms or bugs in the rice and macaroni that was being served to the men. Affiant says that the condition of this rice and macaroni was such that he could not eat it and would not eat it. Affiant says that he does not know that horse meat was served to the men, as he would not be able to detect it, but he does know that horse meat was a part of the Italian rations, and he saw horses in the cattle pen near the slaughterhouse and he was told by persons that they had seen these horses slaughtered for use as rations. Affiant says that he himself saw in the commissary horse meat which he was able to see was horse meat by the hoofs that were on the quarters. Affiant says that in his opinion the charges that the men were not given sufficient food are true. Affiant also says that the men were not furnished with sufficient clothes at certain times during their stay at Cattaro. Affiant says that prior to the investigation that they afterwards learned was being made the rations were not only poor but hardly fit to eat, and the clothes were worn out and many men were compelled to wear torn clothes. In affiant's opinion the charges in regard to the poor clothing were also true. Affiant says that he knows that there were parties given by officers where liquor was served. Affiant knows that at these parties there was served rum, champagne, wine, and beer. Affiant says that on one occasion he knows of a party given by officers in a building which was near his tent and affiant says that he could see that all of the officers were getting plenty to drink. Affiant says that this party which was given exclusively for officers created naturally dissatisfaction among the men, it being given right in their presence, and the officers were drinking while the men were denied such privileges. Affiant says that the officers, to his knowledge, on a number of occasions had been drinking, because he, when talking with them, could smell liquor on their breath. Affiant says that he was able to observe on many occasions officers who were in a condition to lead him to know that they had been drinking. Affiant says that after the investigation into conditions at their camp had been made that there was a great improvement at the camp at Cattaro, Dalmatia; that their rations were improved; and that the men were put on largely American rations. Affiant says that they also were issued clothes and conditions generally were improved.

CANTON, OHIO, January 3, 1919.

Hon. ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MCCULLOCH: The writer has had so many complaints relative to the treatment received by soldiers in Company H, Second Battalion, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, now stationed at Cattaro, Dalmatia, Austria, that he felt it his duty to bring it to your attention. Briefly the complaints are that the soldiers are being fed upon Italian rations and are not receiving sufficient food; in fact, several soldiers, writing to their parents, and who are personally known to the writer, and whose honor, honesty, and integrity could not be questioned, stated that the food was so scarce that it was necessary for them to steal food in order to exist. They also complained that they have received no clothes of any kind since early last fall, and that they have mended and patched their clothing until it will hardly hold together. One soldier stated that the only suit of underwear he had was the suit he was wearing and that it couldn't be washed because it wouldn't hold together. Another complaint is that all the commissioned officers located at this point, with the exception of one lieutenant, are drinking to excess and are drunk practically all the time, and that their actions are so disgusting and disgraceful that the officers of the English, French, and Italian Armies look down upon them with disgust.

Another complaint is that the soldiers have not received any pay for a number of months. These complaints are from letters which I have read, and it is incomprehensible that our boys must be fed upon horse meat, spaghetti, and macaroni, without sufficient clothing, and officered by drunkards. This is a matter that should not be delayed by a red-tape investigation, but should be relieved at once, and because of your activity and the elegant results you obtain for the people of your district I believe that you will make things hum to obtain the necessary relief.

Yours, very truly,

HOMER E. BLACK.

We, the undersigned, being first duly sworn, say that we were members of the company set opposite our names of the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, United States Army.

Affiants say that for a considerable time prior to the investigation that was made at the request of Congressman ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH they were fed on Italian rations and did not receive sufficient food; that the food was not only insufficient but of such a poor quality that it was not fit to eat, and that the rice and macaroni that was served them contained bugs and worms.

Affiants say that the soldiers were often compelled to either buy food or secure it in some other way than through their commissary or mess in order to have enough on which to exist.

Affiants say that for a considerable time, probably two or three months before the investigation referred to was begun, they did not have sufficient clothing; that the clothes of many of the men were so badly torn and so ragged that they were ashamed to appear in public, and when they went out they would have to wear overcoats or wear a blanket to cover their nakedness.

Affiants say that officers did use intoxicating liquors to excess and that there was drinking going on all of the time; and that liquor was either bought by officers or was issued to officers as a part of their rations and consumed by them; that the liquors used were rum, champagne, beer, and wines.

Henry E. Stiffler, being first duly sworn, says that he was a member of Company F, Second Battalion, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, and was recently discharged from the United States service; that before his company went overseas he was a member of Company H, of the same regiment, and was later transferred to Company F; that his regiment went from France to Italy in July, 1917, and that the Second Battalion went to Cattaro, Dalmatia, Austria, in November, 1918; and that his Company F was billetted at Teodo, Austria, and that they remained there until some time in March, 1919, when they returned to Genoa, Italy.

Affiant says that during the entire time that his company was stationed at Teodo, Austria, they were on what is known as Italian rations, furnished by the Italians, and that during the entire time the food furnished the men of his company was not only very insufficient, but also of very poor quality; that rice that was furnished the men was wormy and full of bugs, and that the macaroni contained maggots, and that the hardtack furnished was also full of worms.

Affiant further says that the meat that was furnished the men of his company during all of said time was unfit to eat; that the cans of Italian bully beef that was furnished them were about 3 inches in height and about 2 inches in diameter and contained about 4 to 5 ounces, and that one can was served as the meat ration for three men, and that he observed on some of the cans the date of 1902, which indicated to him that the meat was canned in that year, and that the meat in these cans was slimy, mushy, and not fit to eat.

Affiant further says that on one occasion he saw on a front quarter of an animal in the kitchen of his company what had looked to him like a collar sore on the neck part, which indicated to him that it was a quarter of a horse, and that this was the only meat in the kitchen of his company at that time, and that he knows that the company had no other meat, and that the men of his company were served meat that day, and therefore he has reason to believe that the men were served this meat. Affiant says that on one occasion he saw the hind quarter of an animal furnished the company which had a very bad sore on it, with the appearance of a cancer sore, and that he was present when the medical major examined it and told the captain of his company that that piece of meat was not fit to use, and when the captain asked the medical major if that sore could not be cut out and the rest used, the major replied that it could not, as it was not fit to eat. Affiant says that this quarter was the only meat that the company had at that time, and that the men of his company were served meat that day and must have been served meat from this quarter. Affiant says that the men of his company at this time were so hungry and so starved that they could eat almost anything.

Affiant says that on Thanksgiving Day, 1918, the men of his company for breakfast were served only black coffee and black bread, and that was all they had for breakfast; that for the noon meal all that they had was macaroni and black bread; and for the evening meal all that the men received was rice and black coffee.

Affiant further says that the clothing of the men of his company during the entire period of said time was insufficient and so badly worn that when they marched into Cetinje, Montenegro, they were ordered to put on their overcoats in order to hide the holes in their uniforms; that they were not allowed outside the billets without their overcoats, because their clothing was in such bad and torn condition and contained so many holes. Affiant says that he knows of one soldier of his company, by the name of Spencer, who lost his blouse and leggings at the drive of Victoria Veneto, and that he was without any blouse and without United States leggings for about five months, and that this soldier later secured Austrian leggings, which he wore during all of said time up to and until the investigation which was started by Congressman R. C. MCCULLOCH.

Affiant further says that on one occasion a detachment of 11 men of his company was sent to Cetinje, Montenegro, for the Red Cross, and that their clothing and underclothing was in such bad condition that the nurses volunteered their own underwear to them, and that when they returned to their company they were wearing the clothing given them by the nurses.

Affiant further says that he did not make any complaint to anyone back home in regard to their condition of food and clothing until he saw two boatloads of American rations reach Cattaro, and which was unloaded and delivered to the Montenegrins, hauled to them largely in American trucks. Affiant says that it was at this time that a great deal of discontent arose among the boys, in view of the fact that they had suffered for months in being fed on Italian rations. He then wrote a letter to his mother at home, which letter was printed in the Repository, of Canton, Ohio, which paper containing the letter was received by Lieut. ———, who showed affiant's letter to the captain of his company, and within a few days he was called into the orderly room before the captain and taken to task for writing this letter and mailing it home to his mother, and was given a sentence to be confined for three weeks in the billets of the company. Affiant says that during this time his company was located at Genoa, and that this was some time in March, 1919, and that because of said confinement he was unable to go up street and see the town, or to leave the camp, as did the rest of the boys of his company, and that the only time during the entire three weeks that he was allowed to be on the streets of Genoa was when the entire company was uptown, and that when his company came away from Genoa before his sentence had expired he had not got to see Genoa at all.

Further affiant saith not.

On arrival at Cattaro the men were billeted in a one-story building which had been used as a warehouse; the men were all crowded together, and for a long time they slept on the hard floor without any straw. About four weeks before the company left Cattaro there was straw brought to the billet, but there was not enough to go around.

Affiant says that during their stay at Cattaro and before the investigation started that the soldiers were fed on Italian rations and did not receive sufficient food; that the food they did receive was of such a poor quality that the rice and macaroni contained bugs and worms, and the meat in affiant's judgment was not fit to eat. 1. A father and mother of a boy in the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry write:

"I'm a poor working man. They took my son, don't even give him good place to sleep, fed poor, and clothed so poor. Why don't they give me permission to send him something? I certainly would so he would not have to starve. I think it is about time they came home. I gave my son till the period of the war."

2. Another father and mother of a boy stationed in Italy with the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry write:

"My boy in Italy writes to me nearly every two weeks and tells me about the conditions over there. He said he did not get any pay for two months and don't get enough to eat, and the clothes are not worth washing. If they would wash them they would go apart. I would be glad to send him something to eat if he don't get enough, but I see it is impossible, they will not allow us to send anything to him. I should think if he was good enough to go and fight for his good country he is good enough to get something to eat. If they can't give him that, why don't they send him home where he will get something to eat?"

3. The mother of a boy in the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry stationed at Cattaro, Dalmatia, Austria, writes of the "rotten treatment they get, poor and small rations. They have not the proper clothes to change and keep clean. The officers are drunk most of the time, excepting one lieutenant; he is all right. If it lasts much longer our boys will all be ruined morally and physically. They have gone to stealing rations to exist, and the surroundings are diseased and rotten. Not only my boy has written such news, also other mothers have received letters on the same order."

4. The father of an Ohio boy in the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, stationed at Cattaro, Dalmatia, writes as follows:

"These boys are stationed along the Adriatic Sea doing occupational work, with no prospects of getting home until peace is signed. This would not be mentioned were it not for the fact that they are being kept on Italian rations, and very few of these. Now, I suppose our Government is paying a large sum to the Italian Government for the maintenance of the Three hundred and thirty-second Regiment, but it is sure the boys are not receiving what should be given them. Some of the men who are officers are not the proper kind, or at least they would disclose some of these things. These boys haven't been paid for over two months, otherwise they could buy some things for themselves, if they were to be bought."

5. A father of an Ohio boy says:

"I gave you my son to help the country, and now you can't take care of him, only he have to die from starvation. I raised my son and didn't teach him to steal, and now he's working for Uncle Sam and has to steal for food to keep him up. I'm old, and please send him home so he can make my living.

6. A Cleveland boy, stationed at Cattaro, Austria, with the Three hundred and thirty-second Regiment, says:

"Our rations, supplied by the Italians, are mostly wormy macaroni and rice. We manage to get a bath once a month, but that doesn't feaze the cooties."

7. A boy with the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry in Italy says:

"Yes, the scenery is fine around here, but we can't eat that."

8. An extract from a letter from a boy stationed in southern Italy with the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry reads:

"Down here people are picking oranges and it is not cold. It's good it isn't, as we have no gloves and our clothes are full of holes. I have had one suit and one shirt to wear since October 17, and it is impossible to look decent. We did not get our October pay till December 14 and haven't our November pay yet."

9. Another extract from a letter from an Ohio boy says:

"They say we get good eats and, no doubt, the Yanks do, but we are connected with the Italian Army and we have at times suffered for eats. We get coffee and bread for breakfast, sometimes rice. For dinner we always know the menu for weeks—macaroni, coffee, and bread. For supper some stew, mostly stew, with little stuff in it. The macaroni is sickening. We get so tired of it, and it's fixed poor, too. This is not a very cheery letter, but it relates the condition of the men in Company —. We are expected to work just as hard as if we had good eats; yes, harder. Some do guard duty while the rest work. We are living in an old military building. It's full of bedbugs, fleas, graybacks, and other insects too numerous to mention. We have only one suit with us, and part of that is not here any more.

10. A letter from Toledo, Ohio, says:

"I am a father of a son in service in the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, and I want to say that I was glad and proud to see my boy go to fight for his country but not to lay under drunken officers' feet and starve. I brought him up from a child to a man and did not teach him to steal, and he has to do it to keep alive; so if there can't be any better care for him send him to me and I will care for him. He has done his fight, so it is time for him to be home, and I want him to be home as soon as it can be done."

11. The father of a Canton boy in the Three hundred and thirty-second Regiment writes:

"The boys are apparently receiving no money, no food, no clothing, no chance for a change of clothes or bath, that they are in a desperate condition. Is this the reward for their services rendered, their lives sacrificed, their suffering encountered to keep Old Glory afloat? I realize you are not Secretary of War, nor provost marshal, nor Gen. Pershing, but you are the Representative of the people of this district through whom we talk or secure action. God knows the people of this section and the whole country have paid millions upon millions and conserved food, etc., and yet to get these reports seems hardly believable."

12. A letter from Louisville, Ohio, reads:

"What has the American soldier who willingly went to Europe to fight for the allied nations done that they deserve such abhorent rotten treatment that they are being given now? Being held over there after all the fighting is done. Going months without their pay, as has been proven by men back home. Last week a schoolmate of mine wrote home for money, saying that he did not have any pay since landing there last summer."

13. Letters published in a newspaper in Canton, Ohio, gives the following extracts:

"We don't believe Uncle Sam knows where we are, for we do not get any American supplies, nothing but Italian junk. We are going around with the seats and knees out of our pants."

Another boy brands the Italian rations as slum and says that all his companions are infected with vermin owing to the fact that they have no clothing changes and that the vermin was contracted on the filthy boats used to transport them across the Adriatic Sea.

Another soldier writes to his mother that the meat furnished them comes from old horses killed when their usefulness is ended. This soldier also complains of insufficient clothing.

Another says, "I never want to look spaghetti in the face again; we have it three times a day."

Another—"We had a fine Thanksgiving dinner. We had bread and coffee for breakfast and we had to wait until 2 o'clock for dinner, then we got a cup of coffee and a piece of dry bread again. For supper we had bread and coffee again and some macaroni, but it was full of maggots and I could not eat mine, so you can see what kind of meals we had."

14. A man from Alliance, Ohio, says:

"Oh, the suffering of the poor boys, so homesick, not much to eat, clothes gone, sleep any old place. What is being done with all the money? Please make them hurry the poor boys home."

15. Here is a letter from a mother in St. Paul, Minn.:

"My son is a sergeant in company of the Three hundred and thirty-second Regiment, and I know that from the time the Austrian armistice was signed up until December 29 my son had only the ragged, dirty underclothing he had on. I also know he was sick, cold, hungry, and penniless, and that they did try to steal things to eat. He told me of meeting two Austrian sailors from a ship in the harbor from whom he begged some tins of jam and beans and was going to trade some little souvenirs he had for some more jam. These boys have suffered unspeakable hardships down there in that hell hole of southern Europe, and I ask you to demand their immediate return home. I also ask you to use every means in your power to find who is responsible for these disgraceful conditions."

16. The following is a part of a letter written by a soldier of the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, now a part of the Italian Army in Austria:

"This is the first time I have had to write the truth. We have a hard life. I have not slept in a bed since I left the States. I sleep on the floor now. We get very poor food and it is seldom we get enough of it as poor as it is. Mouldy bread, mouldy rice with hundreds of bugs in it, and meat I would not feed a dog. Have had no November or December pay yet. They are holding us drafted boys over here and telling the people back home they can't get boats. There are enough idle boats here in the harbor to carry a small army home. They are uselessly keeping us here. The people at home better wake up and ask why their drafted boys are not coming home. I think they are going to hold us over here six months or more. It is up to the people at home to see that we get a square deal and that they turn us loose."

17. A letter written from Cleveland, Ohio, says:

"I know that the truths which you brought forward in your exposé are absolute facts. It is true that the men of that regiment (Three hundred and thirty-second) have had to go out at night looking for turnip patches and eating turnips raw, dirt and all, in order to appease their hunger. Neither have they been paid for months."

18. A mother and father of a Canton boy write:

"Quantities of mail arrived in Canton during the past week from these young men who are stationed with the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry at Cattaro, Dalmatia, and they, to say the least, must be very uncomfortably situated and with comparatively little hope of being relieved. Food is remarkably scarce and of poor variety. Clothing in many cases is in shreds, one boy writing that he had worn his underwear four weeks without changing, as it was so tattered it would be impossible to wash and get it back on, and as for mending, it was impossible to do any more to it along that line."

19. The following is part of a letter from a wife of a man with the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry at Cattaro, Dalmatia:

"They are very much in need of clothing and something to eat. Their rations are very slim, and he thinks that his Uncle Sam has forgotten all about the Three hundred and thirty-second. The food they do get is not fit to eat, full of worms. My husband served six years in the Regular Army and never was treated like he has been the past four months; he always praised the Army until now."

20. A letter from Spokane, Ohio, incloses a letter from a man stationed with the Three hundred and thirty-second, and says in part:

"It has been reported that we would be here anywhere from 2 to 18 months, and there was a rumor that we were to leave Italy January 3, 1919, for the States, but that can not possibly be now as we need a complete outfitting. We have to wear overcoats to town when we go on leave to hide the places where we sit. And a lot of fellows are out in shoes. We call our underclothes O. D's. on account of the color. Sox is the only thing we have enough of, and that is only because the Red Cross gave them to us."

21. A letter from the wife of a soldier from Canton, Ohio, says:

"I am a soldier's wife and will greatly appreciate any attention given to this, as I believe you are a man that believes in fair dealing. I have received several letters from my husband dated late in December and January in which he says conditions in Italy are terrible. He is stationd in Austria with the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry. In parts of his letters he writes: 'I will cook you something just for fun that we must eat or starve. Take a small head of cabbage, cut it in four, heart and all, do not wash or clean it, put it in 2 gallons of water, break some macaroni up, do not season it, then try to live on that after working all day. Then for breakfast boil some rice in water without sugar or anything else, then wonder why we kick.' In another letter my husband says: 'Well, I am back from guard and also what they call dinner, which consisted of a piece of bread and some spoiled meat which they tried to camouflage by making pot pie; you could smell it as soon as you came in. I guess they think that we do not know anything. There are quite a few things pulled off that make us all grouchy and discontented. You will pardon me till I reach the United States' shores once again, then I will tell all. If I must stay in this place very long I will not weight 100 pounds. I have to tell you this, but I do not want you to save for us. They may get it in France, but you can bet your last cent we do not here. It is a shame they force us to eat and do things that the boys would not do and keep out of a lot of trouble.' We wives who have given all and given till it hurts, who have given up home, husband, and are living on barely nothing would at least like to have our husbands come home in a condition that they will be fit to live with. How can they keep clean under such management?"

22. Extracts from the letters of another boy stationed at Cattaro, Austria, are as follows:

"We are sort of lost dogs or tramps, as it were, and have been ever since we struck Italy, but I have refrained from saying so for this long time. We are practically isolated from the remainder of the American Expeditionary Forces. We do not have the privileges of writing home like them, get our mail real late, little or no Young Men's Christian Association supplies to buy, pay days late (not paid yet this month, nor even signed the pay roll, which we should have done on November 31); also supplies of grub are very few and far between." In speaking about some money which this soldier sent home just before chasing the Austrians, he comments as follows: "'Twould have been a welcome friend many times to appease hunger if I only bought chestnuts, turnips, or cabbages, or still better, 'Italian bread.' I don't know why it is called bread though, as it resembles 'screenings' in a flour mill or chaff in an old barn full of cobwebs. But do not think we do not eat it. We even steal it and hide it in our pockets for eating between meals and chewing ourselves to sleep. Please be informed, also, that what the papers say of our good eats over here is absolutely false."

Letter from Assistant Chief of Staff, director of operations, in regard to reasons for sending the Three hundred and thirty-second Regiment into Italy to Cattaro and Dalmatia Provinces:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, June 16, 1919.

The Hon. ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH,
House of Representatives, United States, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The Secretary of War directs that I acknowledge receipt of your letter of June 10 in which you desire information relative to the sending of American troops into Italy, Austria, and Montenegro, after the armistice was signed.

Previous to the signing of the armistice an American regiment, the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, was operating in Italy under the general supervision of the Italian high command.

In November, after the armistice, one battalion of this regiment was ordered to Trieste, one battalion to Fiume, and one battalion to Cattaro. The reasons for dividing the regiment in this manner and for sending the battalions to these particular cities can be given only by the Italian high command, but it is presumed that this action was based on a desire to exploit as widely as possible the moral effect of the presence of American troops.

The battalion at Trieste and the battalion at Fiume do not appear to have had any unusual experiences. The battalion at Cattaro took a minor part in activities in connection with disturbances in Montenegro in and around Cetinje, and its participation is described both in reports of our military attaché at Rome and of Maj. Scanland, commanding the battalion of the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry at Cattaro, who was assisted by Capt. Constant Southworth, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, in making his report.

Our military attaché at Rome reported on December 21 that the Italian commander at or near Cattaro desired to enter Montenegro; that he advanced to the border with American troops on the front, and was met by Montenegrins who threatened armed resistance. The Italian commander asked the United States commander what assistance would be provided in forcible entry of Montenegro, and was answered "none." The Montenegrins then fired on the Italians. A French general then reported at Cattaro on December 17 and assumed command.

Nothing further seems to have occurred in which the Americans were especially interested until January.

A struggle in Montenegro broke out between the pro-Serbian Government in power, supported by Serbian troops, and a rebel party which did not desire annexation to Serbia and which disliked the presence of the Serbian troops that were supporting the government in power.

The struggle came to a focus on January 6, just previous to which the insurgents made the following proposals to the French general in command, viz, that Montenegro be occupied by American, English, and Italian troops and that Serbian troops should leave Montenegro. Although the French general sent an answer within two hours, firing was commenced by the Serbians, resulting in 300 Serbian and 100 Montenegrin casualties. The French general ordered a French company to occupy Cettinje, the capital of Montenegro, on January 6. Although he had also ordered at least half an American company to Cettinje, he stopped the American company and machine-gun platoon and an Italian machine-gun platoon at Niegush, well southeast of Cettinje, on January 7. It was later stated that Americans and Italians were to hold line of communication and that only French and Serbian troops were to hold Cettinje. The insurrection was over, leaving the French and Serbians in occupation by January 10.

Maj. Scanland reported regarding this affair as follows:

"This revolution began by a large number of Montenegrins, who were very poorly organized, blockading Cettinje. Fighting began Monday, January 6, 1919. I visited the city that day and the next, passing through both lines on each occasion. * * * The allied troops in Montenegro under Gen. Venel's orders of January 11, 1919, were distributed as follows:

"Serbians to guard road, Bokovica to Dubovic.
"Americans, same to Cettinje.
"French, same to Rijeka.
"Besides there are Italians * * * and English * * *. Of the foreign troops, the Americans are most popular. Besides their known disinterestedness, they are credited by the Montenegrins of having averted much bloodshed and with three times having saved the valley of Njegusi from fighting and pillage. * * *
"The American troops have acted independently as far as possible. They have been at times embarrassed by Italians and Serbians. The former have tried to follow the Americans. The latter have control of the distribution of the American supplies under Government arrangement.
"On Monday, January 27, 1919, the American troops in Montenegro were withdrawn to Teodo, Dalmatia, on the Bocche di Cattaro."

There is nothing in the reports at the War Department which would indicate that the American troops were fired upon. An American officer who was sent on a mission to Montenegro after the above affair occurred reports that h , personally, was fired on, but the attendant circumstances render the incident unimportant.

Trusting that the above information may be of value to you, I am,
Very sincerely, yours,

HENRY JERVEY,
Major General, General Staff,
Assistant Chief of Staff, Director of Operations.

Correspondence with the Secretary of War in regard to treatment of Company H, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 25, 1919.

Hon. ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: On Wednesday, February 5, you read in the House of Representatives a letter from Mr. Homer E. Black, of Canton, Ohio, with regard to the treatment received by soldiers in Company H, Second Battalion, Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, at Cattaro, Dalmatia, Austria. The principal charges were (1) that the soldiers were being fed on Italian rations and not receiving sufficient food; (2) that they had received no clothes of any kind; (3) that all the commissioned officers located at this point, with the exception of one lieutenant, are drinking to excess, are drunk practically all the time, and that their actions are so disgusting and disgraceful that the officers of the English, French, and Italian Armies look down upon them with disgust; (4) that our boys are fed upon horse meat, spaghetti, and macaroni.

Immediately upon the appearance of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing your remarks, I directed Gen. Pershing to have a thorough investigation made with regard to the situation of the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry. I have to-day received by cable the result of a preliminary investigation made by Brig. Gen. Charles G. Treat. It reads as follows:

"Preliminary investigation and records show no horse meat ever eaten or issued; no stealing of food. Clothing and shoes of some individuals badly worn at Cattaro unloading ammunition from Austrian captured ships and marching over mountains in Montenegro, but conditions remedied later on receipt of barrack bags unavoidably delayed in transit. No hardships suffered. No record or knowledge or reports of officers drinking to excess and none observed. No court-martial of officers. Two enlisted men tried by general court for fraud, and approximately only 50 summary court cases in entire history of regiment. This regiment has universally received praise from Allied officers, written and spoken. Payment was delayed one month during active offensive and two months at Cattaro, 700 miles distant, due to difficulty of transport; 17 days for last trip of paymaster; no hardships. Troops have subsisted on Italian rations with American additions as per agreement, and this has been supplemented whenever practicable by American supplies. Quantity sufficient, all components not always available, as often happens in active field service. All in excellent physical condition, robust, and much increased in weight and strength. Less than 15 to 1,000 sick, and practically no venereals. Men well clothed now and have complete new uniforms for each man on debarkation in United States. Am continuing investigation, interrogating every individual, and will submit full report later."

In addition to this investigation, another independent inquiry is being conducted by an inspector from the office of the Inspector General of the American Expeditionary Forces.

Since dictating the foregoing, I have received your letter of February 19. Specifically to answer your inquiry, I did express and do express my disbelief in the charges made in Mr. Black's letter. The preliminary report which I have quoted above is strong evidence in support of my statement. The subsequent reports received will be transmitted to you at once. In the meantime will you not assist the investigation which I have directed abroad by procuring for me, if you can, from Mr. Black or any other person who makes charges of this kind, the source of their information? The character of the officers of this regiment is at stake; their accusers, so far, are anonymous; it is my desire to have a complete disclosure of the facts in order that the innocent may be vindicated and the guilty disciplined. This, I feel sure, is your own view of the proper action to take, and I earnestly request your assistance in making it effective.

Very truly, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

FEBRUARY 27, 1919.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I write to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated February 25 in regard to the charges contained in the letter received by me some time ago from Homer E. Black, of Canton, Ohio, which letter was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in connection with my remarks under date of February 5.

I have received about 50 letters from parents and friends of soldiers in regard to the charges contained in the letter referred to. The letters I have received confirm the charges, especially as they relate to insufficient food and clothing. There are also letters among these I have received bearing upon the other charges contained in the letter. I should refer immediately all of these letters to your department if it were not for the information I have received and the cases that have been cited before the committees of Congress and in speeches upon the floor in regard to the method of disciplining soldiers making complaints. I feel that the penalties that have been imposed after court-martial findings have been very severe and, if my information is correct, in a great many cases very unjust.

I should be very glad before I leave Washington to furnish a representative from your department or call at the department and submit a general résumé of all of the information I have received in support of these charges, and I will also be willing to furnish the names of those who might be called as witnesses if I can have the assurance that no action will be taken toward disciplining such persons just because they made complaint, which I think would be unjust, unless it were maliciously done.

I have no interest in this matter whatever except to do all that I can to see to it that conditions which are not right are remedied, and to the extent I can do so without jeopardizing the interests of persons who have given information I will be glad to cooperate.

Sincerely, yours,

ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 1, 1919.

Hon. ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of February 27.

The charges made with regard to the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, so far as they relate to insufficiency of food and clothing, seem to be adequately disposed of by the two inspection reports received by me and of which copies have been sent to you. They constitute, however, the least important elements of the charges set forth in the letter of Mr. Black. The one which it seems to me is of the gravest gravity is that assailing the character of the officers in the regiment and asserting that with the exception of one lieutenant they are all "drunk practically most of the time." This, of course, is a grave blemish upon the reputation of every officer in that regiment. If it is true, no disciplinary action which could be taken would be too severe; if it is false, those who made the charge ought to be punished for so reckless and cruel a wrong. Of course, neither this regiment nor any other regiment in the Army of the United States could be officered by so dissolute a group of men, and the exaggeration of the statement robs it of credibility. Still the matter remains grave, and I am anxious to have every means possible of investigating this charge and all other charges made against the regiment and the provision for its supply. If you will bring to me personally all the papers you have, I will go over them with you and dispatch such of them as should be sent abroad, in order that the writers may be called as witnesses; and I will, when I send the papers, direct that nobody be punished for writing a letter unless it be found that the accusation made by him is false, in which case, of course, they ought not to be protected against the consequences of their own wrongdoing.

Sincerely, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 28, 1919.

Hon. ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I have this day received from Gen. Pershing a report made by Gen. Baer, of the Inspector General's Department, American Expeditionary Force, who was sent to Italy to investigate the allegations made with regard to the conditions in the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry. This is, as you will observe, a partial report. I will transmit to you the full report as soon as the investigation is completed.

Very truly, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

FEBRUARY 28, 1919, 2.34 A. M.

From H. A. E. F.,
To The Adjutant General, Washington.
No. 2180, February 27. Confidential.
For the Chief of Staff.

Reference A. 2736 and P. 2163, following report just received from Gen. Baer, inspector sent from these headquarters to Italy: "Have not seen battalion at Cattaro. Have commenced inspection and investigation other two battalions. Soldiers well fed. Clothing better than most organizations we have seen in France. Third item (referring to forced theft of food) ludicrous. Meat excellent quality. Some salvaged clothing issued after drives, but has been turned in. New lot clothing received contains large proportion salvaged blouses and some trousers not fit for troops returning to America. Not issued to soldiers at present. Item relative officers untrue. Men paid to date here, and pay to entire battalion en route. Will complete thoroughly investigation." Will forward further report when received.

PERSHING.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means is not present, and he asked me to represent him. It is understood that he would yield 20 minutes to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, yesterday when I called the attention of the House to certain conditions at the Union Station having to do with public service and the manner in which the monopoly is exercised in respect to the supply of taxicabs, I also intended to refer to another District matter, but on account of lack of time was unable to do so.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to that other matter briefly at this time. Members realize that during the heated period of the year in the city of Washington there should be given to employees in the departments and throughout the city every possibility for outdoor exercise and recuperation. It is the only way I think that the physical condition of the men and women living here during this period of the year can be kept up so as to warrant their being able to carry out their appointed duties. We are fortunate in having here two very attractive parks, Rock Creek Park and Potomac Park. Rock Creek Park is one of the most beautiful in so far as natural attraction is concerned that it has ever been my pleasure to visit. Less, perhaps, has been done there, except so far as the roadways are concerned, than in any other park with which I am at all familiar. It is this naturalness that appeals to people, and it is fine to see the use to which it is put, hundreds and hundreds of families these hot nights going out there and getting the benefit of the cool and refreshing air. Potomac Park is very different in its form, but is also a great attraction and great benefit to the public.

During the past two years there has been a tremendous development in the number of people interested in playing the game of golf. It is a game that appeals to all ages, and people getting a little beyond the meridian can secure recuperation and added health by indulgence in and enjoyment of that great game.

I have been very much surprised that here in our progressive Capital there has not been inaugurated any form of a municipal golf course. All large cities to-day have municipal courses. There are a great many people fond of the game who are unable to enjoy it because of the fact that membership in country clubs is expensive. They are, therefore, deprived of that opportunity and privilege. I am glad to know that at the farther end of Potomac Park there is under construction a public golf course, but it will probably be at least two years before that course will be available for public use. There is now a small section of the park, a very small field, set aside for so-called golf practice. It consists of three very poorly kept and short holes—nothing that would attract anyone actually from the viewpoint of playing golf. But there are hundreds of people anxious for the opportunity to indulge in the game, even to that limited extent. The field adjoining the one to which I refer has for some time been absolutely idle. Previous to the war it was known as the polo field; later on it was used for aeroplane landing places, before Bolling Field was constructed in Anacostia. All this summer, except for two pigeon coops, that tract has been practically unused. I have taken this subject up with the Superintendent of the Bureau of Public Parks and Grounds, Col. Ridley, but have not reached very satisfactory results with him. I am free to say that from my communications with the colonel I am disposed to think that he is not much of a golfer; otherwise he would take more interest in those who do enjoy the game using that tract to which I refer. The first objection raised by him was that the polo players were entitled to consideration. Quite likely they are, but there are probably one thousand golf players in the city of Washington to-day to one polo player.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think this Government is more interested in other business than in golf playing, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-four Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

Mr. FESS (Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House). Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill H. R. 7705 and finding itself without a quorum, under the rule the Chair caused the roll to be called, whereupon 227 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and I present herewith the list of absentees, to be recorded in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I was about to conclude the reference I was making at the time the question was raised that there was no quorum. I simply wish to add that it seems to me that the field to which I referred adjoining that used for the game of golf at the present time could be very readily adapted to the further enjoyment of that ancient game by a large number of working people of this city at the present time. I wish that the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds might see fit to use that section in the way to which I have referred. It would entail very little expense and afford recreation to a large number of persons.

I wish now, Mr. Chairman, to turn the attention of the committee to an entirely different matter from that which I have been discussing. I received in the mail this morning—and I suppose every Member of the House did—the volume which I hold in my hand, entitled "The Report of the United States Housing Corporation." This is a volume of over 500 pages, printed on the very finest of paper, with no end of illustrations and cuts and plots and architects' plans and surveyors' designs and every conceivable sort of a proposed plan and existing plan that one might want to incorporate into any record going to make the account of a great effort for future generations to know what some people had done to aggrandize themselves. I was interested to see under what authority any such report as this could be submitted. I find that in the act incorporating the Housing Corporation—or establishing it, rather—one title is "The United States Housing Corporation," the other the "Bureau of Industrial Housing and Transportation," which I believe is the official title. As I say, I was interested to see how the authority could be secured to publish at public expense such a volume as this.

The only authority that I can find, and it is the one to which the president of the organization referred in his official report transmitted to the Secretary of Labor, is section 6 in public act No. 149, Sixty-fifth Congress. That is purely a reference to a report that the President of the United States is directed to make to Congress every year during the life of this organization. This in no way gives authority, in my opinion, to publish at public expense such a document as I hold in my hand.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, is not that scandalous expenditure of public money in keeping with the manner in which that corporation spent most of the money turned over to it?

Mr. TREADWAY. I think it is one of the most outrageous examples of extravagance that ever came to my attention, and it is simply an example of what this same corporation has done from the day on which our legislation gave it birth.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will not the gentleman in searching his mind agree that his greatest objection is that the report refutes all the aspersions cast upon this organization?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not think it refutes any aspersions cast upon this organization. I think it is an example of personal extravagance, nothing else, and personal aggrandizement. Is there anything in this act, Mr. Chairman, that authorized the employment of an editor by the Housing Corporation? For we find on the second page of this publication that it is submitted by Mr. Hubbard as editor of volume 2. An editor having to do with the report to be transmitted by the President of the United States to Congress! Think of it! Now, I have also gone to the extent of making an inquiry as to the probable expense, and I am informed that it would cost about $1 to bind that book alone.

I am informed that at the Government printing rate this volume will actually cost in the neighborhood of $10,000. Probably if you went out in the public market and asked for a contract to print it, it would be a great deal more. I think it is safe to say that such a publication as that can not be put out under $5 a volume.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does not the gentleman know that accompanying that book is a letter stating that it is to be sold at $1.50——

Mr. TREADWAY. I know——

Mr. CALDWELL. And does not the gentleman know under the law we can not sell a book cheaper than it costs to produce it?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do. I am saying that if you went out in the public market and endeavored to secure its printing it would doubtless cost $5.

Mr. CALDWELL. I did not understand that.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think that is a correct statement. But be that as it may, Mr. Chairman, there is $10,000 that the Government wasted on that report. Now, it is but an example of the conduct of the Housing Board from the day it started, and I think it high time that we knew something of the details of that organization——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does not a mere examination of that book show that the Government can not possibly get it for $1.50? If they offer the book at $1.50, it is simply another example of violation of law.

Mr. TREADWAY. I should think that is a very proper statement. I am not enough of an employer of printer's ink to know exact values, but there is a whole page right here where I open the book showing a cut of the dining rooms of Washington residences of the housing buildings.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And all printed on the finest calendered paper?

Mr. TREADWAY. On the best of paper. I am not finding fault with that, because they make good paper up in my district. I do not know whether they sold any for this publication or not, but I should be glad if they had. But has any Member of this House any direct interest in having the page cut of the dining hall right below us here for public distribution? There are all through the volume the very selfsame sort of illustrations. I will not take the time of the House to call further attention to this particular volume, but I would like to close by saying that this has brought to mind what appears to me at least to be the need of a thorough investigation of the whole Housing Corporation. And, looking to that end, I have this afternoon introduced a resolution calling for the appointment of a committee to make such investigation. I hope that later on the House will act favorably on that resolution and that we will know whether the work of the Housing Corporation, in all its vast detail, has been carried on in exactly the same way as this volume has been printed at Government expense.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. A number of resolutions have already been introduced to investigate the manner in which the corporation has expended the public moneys that were turned over to them. The Committee on Rules started an inquiry on one of these resolutions. We learned that the Senate was pursuing a similar resolution, and therefore made some inquiry of the Senate committee that had the matter in charge, and were informed that that committee would make a thorough and complete investigation of the activities of this corporation. Therefore we suspended further action in our committee.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am very glad to hear the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Rules. I had heard rumor of the resolution to which the gentleman refers, and, in order not to duplicate investigations, previous to the introduction of the resolution I have put in the basket this afternoon I went to the document room, and the chief of that room showed me a resolution introduced into the Senate by Senator NEW, which is in no sense similar to the one I have just introduced. And he said that was all there was in the Senate records. The New resolution is simply to investigate the buildings here, whether they are completed or otherwise. There may be other resolutions, but that is the information I secured from the head clerk of the document room this afternoon.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think if the gentleman from Massachusetts will inquire of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], he will find they are proceeding under a resolution that authorizes them to make a complete investigation.

Mr. TREADWAY. I trust that may be true.

Mr. CURRY of California. I wish to say, if the gentleman will yield, if he will inquire he will find that the Senate committee was appointed about two and one-half months ago and has not done anything since.

Mr. SEARS. If I remember correctly, the gentleman from Florida, my colleague [Mr. CLARK], tried to secure action in this House during the last session in order to make an investigation. I remember that he made a personal investigation. I understand the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds by a unanimous report, led by your able chairman, Mr. LANGLEY, has reported out a bill or resolution, and that they will make a thorough and complete investigation.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will say to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] that I saw the resolution presented by his colleague, providing that the investigation should be made by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I think that is the resolution to which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] refers as having been before the Committee on Rules and on which there has not yet been action taken. The resolution which I presented is for a special committee rather than for a standing committee of the House to conduct the investigation.

Mr. SEARS. The gentleman is correct. My colleague tried for several days to have the Rules Committee report out a special rule in order that a thorough and complete investigation might be made.

Mr. TREADWAY. And irrespective of what the procedure may be, some investigation of this Housing Corporation should be promptly and efficiently made. That is all I am aiming to secure.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In answer to the gentleman from Florida, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me——

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The reason the Committee on Rules suspended action upon the resolution was, as heretofore stated, that the Senate was pursuing a similar investigation, and we did not think it necessary to duplicate investigations into the same concern.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I have not the floor, but if my friend will permit——

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. SEARS (continuing). I wanted to say that this has been neglected, and my colleague and personal friend, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], made several speeches on the proposition here during the last session.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TREADWAY. I will yield if I can get more time.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman in order that he may answer questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I wish to state that a bill came before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds a short time ago to dissolve and abolish this corporation and turn the business of it over to the Capitol Building and Grounds Committee, and that bill has been reported unanimously by the committee and is now pending before this House. If the gentleman wishes to get some action on this matter, the sooner he takes it up the sooner he will get action.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will.

Mr. KEARNS. I was just wondering whether or not there was a criminal statute under which men could be punished who divert public funds from the channel for which they are intended? Is there such a statute?

Mr. TREADWAY. Personally I am not capable of passing on the inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. KEARNS. Why not?

Mr. TREADWAY. There should be if there is not now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me put in one for 20 minutes now. I thought the gentleman just wanted two minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have one for 5 minutes and another for 10 minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Suppose you put in your five-minute man.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman I wanted to yield to wanted 10 minutes. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I desire to make a few observations in regard to the soldiers' insurance, and I want at the outset to assure Members of the House that I am doing that not in a critical mood or manner but in the hope that certain reforms may be brought about in the management of the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Along the fore part of July I received a letter, as undoubtedly every Member of Congress did, from the War Risk Insurance Bureau requesting me to write an article urging the service men to retain their Government insurance. July 18 an advisory committee, headed by ex-Justice Charles E. Hughes, after an investigation of the bureau, made a report which disclosed that 75 per cent of the men had already dropped their insurance. This was indeed startling information to me, as at the time this insurance law was enacted it was termed "the most generous piece of legislation ever written on the statute books of a grateful nation."

I complied with the request of the bureau and prepared an article calling the attention of the service men to the benefits and rates of Government insurance. This article was sent to every newspaper in my district and was published by nearly all of them. Since that time I have heard from a number of the service men in regard to Government insurance. Judging from these letters and from other sources of information, I find:

First. No marked preference or enthusiasm for Government insurance over insurance in some private company.

Second. A lack of confidence in the present management of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. This is due chiefly to the trouble many men had in getting their allotments and allowances paid as they directed when they entered the Army and the unnecessary delays in paying death losses to the beneficiaries.

Third. Inability to get information from the bureau. Most of the letters I have received are not from men who have dropped their insurance and ask to be reinstated, for of that kind I have not received a single one, but the letters are from men who have written to the bureau for information, and a few of them repeatedly, how to convert their insurance, and who had received no reply from the bureau. For this there can be no explanation except either laziness or inefficiency on the part of the managers of the bureau. If any of these men had written a letter to a private insurance company for information concerning a policy he held in that company, or about one he expected to take out, he would have received an answer by return mail. And the chances are nine in ten that one of the company's agents would have called on him even before the company's letter reached him. If the Government wants to stay in the insurance business it must promptly take care first of all of its policyholders. If the bureau fails to give information to the men who want to retain their Government insurance and to make prompt settlement with the beneficiaries named in the policies, the Government might as well go out of business. If any private concern would do business the way the bureau does it would be in 90 days past all hope of restoring itself in the public confidence. To those who have watched closely the workings of the War Risk Insurance Bureau it is difficult to escape the conclusion that the men who are responsible for its management are undertaking deliberately to wreck the Government insurance business.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. Does not the gentleman really think the Government ought to have an agency of some kind in every State of the Union?

Mr. RAMSEYER. It will have to do something or else go out of business.

Mr. AYRES. In order to have these men renew their policies?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am not presenting any plan of organization, but something has to be done or a large part of the 25 per cent of the men who still hold on to their policies will also drop them.

Mr. AYRES. That is a fact with respect to the old-line insurance companies, that they have an agent in every community. The Government will have to resort to that in order to keep its business?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes; and the first thing the Government must learn is promptness in dispatch of its business. The one thing that appeals especially to those seeking life insurance is the promptness with which private life insurance companies settle their losses. If a policyholder of one of these companies dies, usually one of its agents is near to expedite settlement. In a week or 10 days the bereaved widow is paid the full value of the policy. That is good business. It is the best kind of advertising the company can get. Just as an illustration, last fall a Congressman's secretary, who had enlisted, died while on leave from one of the Army camps in this country. He had $5,000 insurance with a private insurance company and $10,000 with the Government, both in favor of his mother. Within 10 days after his death his mother was paid the $5,000 by the private company, but even though this young man's friends here in Washington did everything possible to expedite payment of the Government insurance, it was over six months before the mother received a dollar on her son's Government policy.

When I was diverted I was discussing the inability of service men to get information from the bureau. In this connection I am going to read you a few extracts from letters which I have received in response to the article which I had published in the District papers. The first is from a soldier who served with the American Expeditionary Forces. Among other things, he writes:

> I also read a letter of yours in the Albia Republican relative to soldier's insurance. Now, I let mine lapse or dropped it in July for no other reason than that I did not know just how to convert it into another form of insurance. I have written to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, but they have failed to give me any reply.

The second letter is also from a man who had seen service with the American Expeditionary Forces in France. He writes:

> No doubt you have been bothered a great deal about the question of Army insurance, and also no doubt you are well posted on that subject. I have been trying for several months to get information from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance regarding the possibility of changing my insurance into some standard insurance policy, but as yet have been unable to get an answer from them.
> Can you not let me know what arrangements have been made for converting this insurance to a standard policy? I do not wish to continue any longer than necessary the monthly payments. It seems to be an impossibility to get any response from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

The third is from a man who wrote me concerning a claim that has been pending in the War Risk Insurance Bureau for over a year. He writes in behalf of another party, in part, as follows:

> If you can help to bring results in this matter, I assure you it will be appreciated by him and personally will consider it a great favor myself. I might add that the fact that there is so much dissatisfaction with the returns on this kind of insurance is in a great part responsible for the fact that the boys are dropping it generally. I have a boy who is still carrying $10,000, but am not altogether sure that it will be continued. Success to you these busy and strenuous times.

Now, so much for the failure on the part of soldiers, sailors, and marines to get any response out of the War Risk Insurance Bureau concerning matters in which they are vitally interested. I have numerous other letters along the same line, but I shall not take up the time of the House to read them to you.

These few extracts from letters I have received are samples of the kind of correspondence that has come to my office since the publication of the article to which I referred in the beginning of my remarks.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. I notice the statement that 75 per cent of the insurance business has been canceled. How many of the employees of that bureau have been dropped on account of the fact that 75 per cent of the business has been canceled?

Mr. RAMSEYER. My information is that they have a larger force now than they had during the war. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. How many will you have to have when it is all gone? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAMSEYER. The question asked by the gentleman from New York, of course, answers itself.

The other point I desire to discuss is dissatisfaction with the rates.

I do not claim to have a technical understanding of the insurance business, and, of course, am not an expert on insurance rates. I am simply giving you the objections that came to me. I have had no kicks on the rates charged during the enlistment period, but the kicks are on the rates of converted policies—ordinary life, 20-payment life, 20-year endowment, and so forth. It is true the Government rates are lower than the rates of old-line companies, but the annual difference is not much. And you let an insurance agent get off his talk about participating and nonparticipating policies, annual dividends, net cost, continuous-income plan, commuted value, surrender value, and a lot of other stuff, the average fellow is not so sure that he has a great advantage in his Government insurance policy.

In this connection I am going to read you a letter from a returned soldier which strikes me as a very forceful and interesting presentation of the reasons why some service men drop their insurance. Undoubtedly the thoughts presented by this writer are shared by many, not only of the 75 per cent who have dropped their insurance but also of the 25 per cent who are still holding on to their insurance:

I note in the papers an appeal written by you to the returned soldiers regarding the lapse of the Government insurance. I am a returned soldier and one of the small 25 per cent who are keeping up the premiums since leaving the Army. I believe I can give you an idea as to why some of the men are lapsing their policies, as I have talked with a considerable number on the question.

In the first place it is well known that when the men enlisted they believed the Government insurance to be regular insurance at less than half the regular rate, instead of simply a five-year term policy at about the same rate that any old-line company could supply it. Now, rightly or wrongly, this is what the men believed, and we are dealing with facts as they are and not as they should be. Then, after November 11, when the War Department started to talk converting the insurance to some standard policy at an increase of 150 per cent in the premium, it came as a decidedly unwelcome jolt.

A million men figured, "Well if they are going to sell us insurance in peace time at more than double the war rate, I'll just lay off," and they did. Now, I realize the flaw in the reasoning as well as anyone, and I realize the double value of standard policies over term insurance, but that does not affect what has actually happened in the minds of other men.

In the next place I believe (although, of course, I don't know the figures) that another million dropped out for a little different reason. They carried their insurance just as it was for a month or so after leaving the Army and planned on converting it within the five-year period. Then, one bright day they discover that instead of their insurance being such a bargain as they had supposed, that when they do convert it they will have to pay nearly the same premium as though it were to be purchased from an old-line company.

There is a little difference, a matter of a dollar a thousand, and Mr. Average Man finds he has been pinching himself to keep up a supposedly good thing only to find out that he hasn't got as much as he anticipated. He then thinks "Well, here I am, nearly busted, and the old bonus money gone to buy an outfit of clothes"—it takes considerable figuring to do that—"so I guess we will let the insurance lapse. Insurance is a good thing, all right, but I can buy it from any old-line company just about as cheap, and I would rather pay a little more later and not be so flat right now."

All argument to the contrary notwithstanding, the men feel they were promised very reasonable insurance by the Government and that the Government has some way or another doubled the ante on them, and they refuse to go further with it. If it is an object of the Government for the men to keep up their insurance, let it make a contract which will be good enough that the men will want to take advantage of it. We read a lot about cheap insurance for the soldiers, but just let a good old-line salesman talk figures and clauses to you. If the War Risk Bureau is going to keep on under the present plan, all right; but lets not talk of the wonderfully cheap soldier insurance and wonder why they drop such a gold mine.

I am still, and I want to remain, of the opinion that a Government policy is the best obtainable policy. But the bureau ought to let its policyholders know it. Whether the rates could be lower, I shall not venture an opinion on that. Only the physically fit got into the service. Except a comparatively small per cent who came out of the service injured or diseased, the men on the whole came out of the service in better physical condition than when they went in. They are the best risk in the world for any insurance company. This fact was undoubtedly considered by the bureau in fixing the rates for converting the insurance. If it was not, it should have been. One thing sure, the Government is making no profits out of this insurance and never will. The bureau should do business on a business basis, and give these men the service and prompt attention to which they are entitled and which they were promised, or Congress should abolish this bureau and create some Government institution that will. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, on last Friday I called attention to the fact that the blind Chaplain of this body, a Republican and a Union soldier, who had lost his eyesight in the War between the States, had been criticized by the Republican Speaker for praying for the league of nations. The league of nations has for its purpose the promotion of peace and the prevention of war. Let me read the prayer that aroused the wrath of the Speaker and that occasioned the censure of the blind old Chaplain's petition to God in behalf of peace in the world:

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer: "We bless Thee, our Father in Heaven, for the wise, the true, the noble men who have witnessed the terrible disasters which a world-wide war has left in its wake, who are striving to form a league of nations to prevent its recurrence in the future. Let those who object to a league of nations visit Arlington, our national cemeteries, and those in France where our American dead lie in abundance. Let them witness the wounded and maimed, with arms, legs, eyes, health gone; ponder these unsightly scenes before they lift their voices against those who would prevent such scenes."

[Applause.]

That, Mr. Chairman, is the appropriate and eloquent prayer that offended the Speaker of this House, who, like Senator LODGE, is opposed to a league of nations. I hold that the Chaplain of the American House of Representatives had a right to pray that prayer and that no Speaker, be he Democrat or Republican, had the right to reprove and humiliate him as the Speaker of this House did the old blind Chaplain a few days ago. The Chaplain's prayer was exactly in line with the teachings of Christ, who preached the doctrine of peace on earth and good will to men. It was in perfect harmony with God's desire revealed through the prophet Isaiah, when he said: "And they shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks, and nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let me read to you the preamble to the league of nations:

The high contracting parties, in order to promote international cooperation and to achieve international peace and security by acceptance of obligations not to resort to war; by the prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations; by the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among governments; and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another, agree to this covenant of the league of nations.

Gentlemen, this is the preamble to the greatest international document ever fashioned by the brain of man or submitted to the children of men. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And yet the blind Chaplain of this House has been censured by the Speaker for praying for the success of this international effort to promote peace in the world. But, Mr. Chairman, there is consolation to the blind Chaplain in the fact that One more powerful than the Speaker of this House has said, "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I trust that I may escape censure for quoting scripture in this Chamber. [Laughter.]

The Chaplain, this faithful old servant of God, beloved by the membership of this body for his Christian life and for the powerful prayers that he has prayed through the long years of his service here, for the first time in his service of 24 years is censured and humiliated because his prayer to God does not conform to the league of nations attitude of the present Republican Speaker. He served the House as Chaplain for eight years while Mr. CANNON was Speaker, and not one time did UNCLE JOE ever try to dictate to the old man what the wording of his prayer should be. He was nominated in a Democratic caucus and elected Chaplain of a Democratic House for eight years while Mr. CLARK was Speaker, and never during that time did the Democratic Speaker even intimate to the old blind Chaplain that he desired that his petitions to Almighty God should conform to the Speaker's will. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But we have a new and strange condition of things here now, gentlemen. Republican leaders who have advocated the league of nations for years, who have made the strongest pronouncements in its behalf that I am able to find anywhere, are to-day, when the thing is at our door for indorsement, trying to defeat the league of nations. They are holding up its ratification. They are undertaking to amend the text of the treaty; and if they do, it must be recommitted to Germany for her approval. Do these Republican leaders desire to give Germany an opportunity to refuse to sign the amended treaty?

Let me read you the headlines of a dispatch in the Washington Post from Berlin:

GERMANY SECRETLY ORGANIZES ARMY—SOCIALIST ORGAN WARNS THE GOVERNMENT—ENDANGERS TREATY.

BERLIN, August 23.

The German Army, as in the days of Napoleon, is being secretly organized.

I told you here on last Friday that an American chemist from the State of New Jersey has just finished a tour of Germany, and on his way back stopped in London and said:

Since October last Germany has made superhuman efforts to perfect her chemical processes. She has multiplied and increased her chemical factories.

Can it be that the delay in ratifying the peace treaty in the United States is encouraging Germany to believe that her plans and not the plans of the Allies will yet be successful? Germany is building up an army secretly and multiplying her chemical processes, and the Senate of the United States, under Republican rule, is holding up and may defeat the ratification of the league of nations.

Germany is fighting to defeat the league of nations, and men in the United States, leading Republicans who heretofore have favored a league of nations, and who advocated it before the young men in Massachusetts, are now opposing it. Senator LODGE in his speech at Union College in 1915, addressing young men—who must always bear the brunt of battle in time of war—told them that the only way to defeat war is to unite the nations into a mighty international tribunal. Now, this Republican leader has had a change of heart and is against the league of nations.

The Speaker of the House hails from the same State of Massachusetts—a great State and a large munition-making State—and I can not quite understand the present attitude of this distinguished Republican Speaker. In response to my charge that the Chaplain had been forbidden to pray in this body for the success of the forces fighting to prevent war and promote peace, the Speaker is quoted as saying, "I did speak to him about it, because I did not want any controversial matters injected into prayers."

Gentlemen talk about the liberty of the citizen and the freedom of the press. What we need now is an untrammeled Chaplain in the freedom of prayer. Never did I think that the day would come under the control of any party when the Speaker of this House would arrogate to himself the authority to fix the form of a Chaplain's prayer. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I knew that the Speaker had the right, if a bill was not properly drawn, to rule it out, and I knew that if a resolution was not in proper form he had the right to rule it out; but I never knew before that a Republican Speaker of the House would rush in where angels fear to tread and undertake to prescribe the form of prayer to Almighty God. [Applause.] We still have free speech on the floor of this House, and I want to say that I regard the opposition to the league of nations in the United States as a fight against the peace-loving forces of the world. [Applause.] I regard it as an effort to take away from the father whose boy died in battle and who has other boys coming on, and from the mother who saw her boy go away never to come back—I regard it as an attempt to take out of their hearts the hope of peace on earth and good will to men. [Applause.]

The Speaker of the House [Mr. GILLETT], the distinguished Republican Speaker from Massachusetts, does not like to have the Chaplain pray for the success of the league of nations. Let me now show you what this Speaker of the House himself did in 1916 regarding international peace and order. We passed a bill in this House in which he is committed to the doctrine of a league of nations. Now, here is what it is, the naval bill of 1916.

This is the provision:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to adjust and settle its international disputes through mediation or arbitration, to the end that war may be honorably avoided. It looks with apprehension and disfavor upon a general increase of armament throughout the world, but it realizes that no single nation can disarm, and that without a common agreement upon the subject every considerable power must maintain a relative standing in military strength.

In view of the premises, the President is authorized and requested to invite, at an appropriate time, not later than the close of the war in Europe, all the great Governments of the world to send representatives to a conference, which shall be charged with the duty of formulating a plan for a court of arbitration or other tribunal, to which disputed questions between nations shall be referred for adjudication and peaceful settlement, and to consider the question of disarmament and submit their recommendation to their respective governments for approval.

Gentlemen of the House, Speaker GILLETT voted for that provision. [Applause.] The Chaplain of this House has been praying in line with that vote of Speaker GILLETT's ever since 1916 [applause]; and the other day, after the President had done what the provision that Speaker GILLETT voted for requested him to do, and had returned with the covenant to submit to his Government for approval, and the thing was ready for accomplishment, and the Chaplain, happy over the outlook, prayed for its success, why, he is censured and humiliated for a prayer out of harmony with the changed attitude of the Speaker. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And he has not since mentioned the league of nations in his prayer.

Mr. KING. Hooray!

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; you may say, "Hooray," and I remember when the gentleman [Mr. KING] objected to printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a simple resolution from the people of Georgia in the interest of world peace.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must be in order.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I have not time now.

Mr. KING. You do not dare yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I recall that Mr. OVERSTREET asked permission to print a short resolution sent here by some people in Georgia asking for the adoption of the league of nations, and the gentleman objected to printing it in the RECORD. But I have not time now to discuss the gentleman's objection. I am operating on larger fish just at present. [Laughter.]

Mr. KING. The gentleman had better work on himself. He is a pretty good size fish.

Mr. HEFLIN. Let me read what the editor of the Philadelphia Record said on the subject:

The blind Chaplain of the House of Representatives prayed to the Creator that the league of nations might be established to perpetuate the peace of the world, and Speaker GILLETT, who comes from the same State as Senator LODGE, once the Puritan State, once the exponent of the New England conscience, rebuked him for introducing politics into his prayers.

The purpose of the league of nations is to prevent a recurrence of the great war by providing an organization ready to act instantly in restraining one nation from attacking another. Does anyone wish to see the great war repeated? Can anyone contemplate calmly another outbreak of slaughter with 7,000,000 deaths and 20,000,000 or 30,000,000 casualties of every sort, and with a war area devastated like Belgium and a considerable part of France and all of Serbia and Poland?

What do you think of that?

What shall a Chaplain pray for if not for the reign of peace? And Senator LODGE and Theodore Roosevelt have told us—the latter in two or three of his books, and running over the period from 1910 to 1916—that the only way of insuring the world's peace is by a combination of nations to prevent one nation from attacking another. If that is politics, who made it such? Who are the champions of the devil in opposing peace and insisting that the way shall be kept open always for war?

If a Chaplain may not pray for the establishment of the league of nations to compel the peaceful settlement of controversies between nations, then the offering of prayers in Congress is a mockery and a profanation.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Newspapers all over the country are criticizing, and properly criticizing, the Speaker for his unjustified and unwarranted reproval of the Chaplain of this House.

It seems that certain Republican leaders would like to change the scriptural quotation from "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God," to "Blessed are the munition makers, for we shall inherit abundant campaign funds from them in the year 1920." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama five minutes more.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, gentlemen, I want to read to you the exact language of Senator LODGE:

There is no escape from the proposition that the peace of the world can only be maintained as the peace of a single nation is maintained—by the force which the united nations are willing to put behind the peace and order of the world. Nations must unite as men unite in order to preserve peace and order. The great nations must be so united as to be able to say to any single country, "You must not go to war," and they can only say that effectively when the country desiring war knows that the force which the united nations place behind peace is irresistible. No one is more conscious than I of the enormous difficulties which beset such a solution of such a scheme, but I am certain that it is in this direction alone that we can find hope of the maintenance of the world's peace and the avoidance of needless wars.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Can you reconcile that position of Senator LODGE with his position of to-day?

Modern war is terrible. Something must be done to prevent war in the future. The war just ended was the most horrible war of the ages, and it was for a great international effort to prevent the recurrence of another such war that the blind Chaplain was praying in the American House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, the question that confronts us is not what we as a nation would like to do, but the question is what is the wisest and best thing to do and what is necessary to do. We know that we had nothing to do in bringing on the war just ended, and when it began we did all in our power to keep out of it; but we were drawn into it by a power that thought itself big enough and strong enough to conquer the world. So we had to fight to help put down this war monster of the Old World or be consumed by it. We have learned through bitter experience, at a cost of twenty-odd billions of dollars and the thousands of wounded and dead American soldiers, that one country on the other side of the ocean, left unwatched and unrestrained to arm and equip itself for war, can, as Germany did, endanger the liberty and civilization of the world. If the league of nations is established, Germany will not, she can not, again become a dangerous outlaw nation, disturbing and destroying the peace of the world. We were forced to go into the war to save free government the world over. Now, is it not the part of wisdom for us to join with the other peace-loving nations and use our power and influence to prevent another such war. We had no opportunity to aid other nations who felt as we do about war in preventing the war just ended, and when it came it drew us into it over our protest and against our will; but now we have the opportunity to unite our forces in an effort to promote peace and prevent war. I had rather America would be in position to use her influence in preventing war rather than to have her without power or influence to prevent a war that is bound to break out in the Old World unless the civilized forces of the world unite to prevent it. She had better use her influence and power in time of peace to prevent war rather than to permit an outlaw nation to do the thing that will force her into such a war as the one just ended.

It seems to me to be the part of wisdom for us to create an international force for the purpose of preventing war rather than to permit warlike nations to arm and equip themselves and begin a war that will force us to fight. The first plan promises peace, and we believe will prevent war, while the other plan leaves us at the mercy of the old system that has produced all the wars of the past and will produce more wars in the future. On the side of the old system is darkness. On the side of the new system is light. On the side of the old system is crime and misery and death, and on the side of the new system is justice, peace, and life. If the old system is to remain to curse us and our children, write across its front of black despair the words, "War, certain war." But if the new system, with its possibilities of law and order, its promise of peace, is to be established, write upon the arch that spans its blessed highway the encouraging words, "The hope of the peace of the world." Let no man or nation be deceived. Every man and every nation that favors war is against the league of nations.

Every German agent and every citizen in our country who was in sympathy with Germany in her war against the United States is opposing the league of nations. Newspapers friendly to Germany during the war, and which were denied the use of the United States mails because of the treasonable articles that they contained, are now abusing President Wilson and opposing the league of nations. Germany is doing all in her power to defeat the league of nations. She signed the peace treaty under protest. She wants to be left free to arm and equip herself for another war. If the league of nations is defeated, Germany will become an armed camp within 10 years from now. She intends to take, and she will take, Russia, Austria, and Turkey, and with Germany weld them into the mightiest military despotism that ever cursed the world. When the end of the awful war came last fall and the curtain went down on the battle fields of France the munition and gun makers of the United States were selling billions of dollars' worth of their products to our Government and to our Allies. All of this tremendous traffic in war implements stopped suddenly and the men who had been doing such a flourishing business for months were not willing to have the lucrative traffic in war implements to stop, and they said the league of nations proposes to settle disputes by arbitration, to bring about reduction in war equipment, and to prevent war, therefore the league of nations will interfere with our business, and we will quietly oppose its ratification.

They are aiding the propaganda against the league of nations financially and otherwise, and it may appear as a strange coincidence, but the Republican leaders who are bitterly opposing the league of nations come from the big gun and munition-making States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Massachusetts. The munition and gun makers know that if the league of nations is defeated war will be, as always heretofore, the only arbiter for the settlement of international disputes, and that every country on the globe will begin at once to arm and equip itself for existence on a war basis, and then in the absence of a league of nations the gun and munition makers of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Massachusetts will in the next 10 years sell billions of dollars' worth of war implements to the nations of the earth and then another war will come and our boys will have to go out and meet in battle the very weapons that we ourselves have made and sold. The league of nations has come to say to the nations of the earth as the blessed Christ said to Peter, "Put up thy sword." But this plan for world peace interferes with the sale of war implements, and our munition and gun makers are against it. They are backing Republican leaders who oppose it. Ex-President Taft is right in his position that certain Republican leaders are opposing the league of nations purely on political grounds; that they are against it simply and solely because it happens to be submitted by a Democratic President. If there ever was a measure that should have the whole-hearted support of all men in all parties, it is the league of nations. It sounds the death knell of rule by force. It is the league of nations and peace, or militarism and war. Choose you this day which one you will support. Let us, Democrats and Republicans alike, put aside our party differences and dedicate ourselves to the cause of right, justice, and peace. Democratic boys and Republican boys fought side by side in putting down a war monster that threatened the overthrow of their country and the destruction of free government the world over. They succeeded in putting down that destructive monster; now let us, Democrats and Republicans, rise to the full measure of duty as American patriots and see to it that these boys are not deprived of the fruits of their victory. [Applause.]

The man who places the desire to accumulate money above the desire for the safety of his country and the protection of the lives of American boys is against the league of nations. These Republican leaders who are now opposing the league of nations voted for a proposition in the naval appropriation bill in 1916 which committed them, every one of them, to the principles of arbitration, reduction in armament, and the establishment of an international tribunal for the prevention of war. The President has done just what the provision in the naval bill, for which they voted, requested him to do. He has submitted to the Senate the league of nations plan which carries out the purpose of the naval bill provision approved by both branches of Congress in 1916. Is not this change in the attitude of Republican leaders enough to cause the intelligent and peace-loving people of America to look with deep concern and with some degree of suspicion upon gentlemen who have solemnly declared in favor of an international tribunal to prevent war? The man or the party that will play politics with this momentous question deserves the condemnation of all right-thinking people. There are two or three disgruntled and discredited Democrats in official positions who have deserved and received the contempt and scorn of their constituents because of their Pottsdam-tainted opposition to the league of nations. They did not have during the war between the United States and Germany the confidence of the President of the United States. The position of these men, as well as that of Republican leaders who are opposing the league of nations, is entirely in harmony with Germany's efforts and desires. Every day's delay in ratifying the peace treaty encourages the German agents in the United States to believe that their propaganda is bearing fruit and that there is hope of defeating the league of nations. Believing this, they continue their disquieting and disturbing activities in every way possible to produce dissatisfaction and disorder among our people. Our trade relations with the Old World are disturbed. Our customers do not know what to do. They do not know what we are going to do. They do not know whether they have got to go forward with military preparation for another war or whether the civilized nations are going to join together to prevent war. They are in a state of unrest and uncertainty. They know not what to do. Just as soon as the millions of people in Europe find that the United States, the greatest Government in the world, has decided against international outlaw and murder they will settle down and go to work. [Applause.]

Nothing else will give that assurance. Our country and all the peace-loving countries of the world demand that this thing be settled and settled now in favor of peace and order. They all claim that no political party and no nation has the right to play politics with the lives of human beings or gamble on the peace of the world. [Applause.]

If the food destroyed by the German submarines could be had now there would be no food famine and starvation in the Old World. What is responsible for the unrest and distracted condition that we see on every hand in the Old World? There is but one answer, war. What was it that took millions of men out of the fields of production and upset the peaceful processes through which the human race was fed and clothed? There is but one answer, war. What was it that took millions of men out of farms and factories and drove them to manufacturing munitions and implements with which to kill? There is but one answer, war. If the war just ended has produced the woe and misery that now afflicts the world what is the first duty of the civilized nations in this aftermath of that terrible struggle? It is to unite their forces in creating a tribunal to prevent the recurrence of another such war. Germany is sore and sullen. She has never repented of her wrongs and crimes.

Von Loringhoven, of the German general staff, has just written a book, in which he says that Germany must be able to keep on the offensive in the next war—next war, mark you. German officers, on leaving Strassburg, said to the French inhabitants: "We will be back in five years."

German officers are quoted as saying when the armistice was signed: "We did not succeed this time, but we will next time."

Is the peace and the safety of the world to be left again to the intrigue and war mania of Germany? The thought of such a monstrous thing was enough to cause the blind Chaplain to invoke the aid of the God of Justice and Mercy in establishing a league of nations to prevent such a thing.

Mr. Chairman, the nations that banded together to prevent the destruction of civilization and liberty, turning away from the miserable slaughterhouse of war, have expressed in the peace treaty just submitted their desire and determination to establish an international tribunal to oppose and, if possible, to prevent war. They realize that the civilized nations must now unite their forces for the maintenance of law and order or permit the old order to remain with no restraining or controlling power anywhere. Such a course would be the surrender of civilization to the brute force and barbarities of the Dark Ages.

The league of nations has come to establish peace, founded upon the principles of common right and justice. It comes to condemn and cast down war as the arbiter of disputes between nations and to set up in its stead an arbitration board, which has for its purpose the enforcement of the laws of justice, the promotion of peace, and the prevention of war.

The league of nations is a covenant by its members to keep the peace, and it confers power to be used, if necessary, to prevent outlaw nations from disturbing and destroying the peace and happiness of the rest of the world. It is the ark of the covenant of nations lodged upon the Ararat of universal peace. [Applause.]

Can anyone blame the blind Chaplain, who personally knows the horrors of war, for praying for the success of the forces that are striving to promote peace in the world?

Mr. Chairman, let us highly resolve that the sacrifices which our country has made for liberty and progress shall not have been made in vain. Let us say, "Lead on, America; the path of your destiny beckons you on." The failure of America to ratify the league defeats the whole plan. Defeat the league and you tear out of the heart the hope of peace. You throw across the vision of the future the black mantle of despair. You substitute the word "war" for "peace" among the nations. The world is praying for deliverance from the bondage of war. The nations are crying out as did St. Paul, "Who will deliver me from the body of this death?" And here stands the party of Lincoln and McKinley, misrepresented by its shortsighted bosses, standing in the way of permanent peace. The only plan submitted for peace among the nations is bitterly opposed by the leaders of the Republican Party. Go read the Clemenceau indictment against Germany and you can see factories in ruins, homes and churches burning, struggling, drowning women and children mocked by submarine captains. You can hear the groans of soldiers gassed as they roll in the death struggle gasping for breath. You can hear the pitiful shrieks of ravished women. You can hear the low moans and murmurs of vanquished millions as the sons of France, Belgium, and Britain go to death in battle with the murderous Hun. Then hear the heroic Tiger of France as he says:

> The allied powers will be false to those who have given their lives, their all, to save the freedom of the world if they consent to treat war on any other basis than as a crime against humanity.

[Applause.]

All of these things moved the blind Chaplain to call upon God to prevent shortsighted and selfish mortals in official station from going against and casting down the highest and best interest of human beings made in God's own image.

Fathers and mothers and ministers of the Gospel everywhere, like the blind old Chaplain, are praying God's blessings upon the league of nations.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state the date of the Chaplain's prayer for the success of the league of nations?

Mr. HEFLIN. June the 12th, 1919; but I did not learn what happened regarding it until a few days ago. I regret that some gentlemen on the Republican side laugh when we condemn the censure of the blind Chaplain's prayer. Can it be that he must stand each morning now and pray, wondering all the while if the man sitting behind him is pleased with his prayer, and is he refraining from saying things that his heart yearns to say? Mr. Chairman, whether he be a Democrat or a Republican Speaker, in the name of all the sacred traditions of this House and in the name of the free people of America, I repudiate the attempt to guide the mind and control the conscience of and stifle free speech in the blind Chaplain's prayer to God the Omnipotent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the Almighty must feel very much encouraged, indeed gratified, by the eloquent address to which He must have listened with close attention, just delivered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. I fear that if it had not been for the remarks of our distinguished friend, the Almighty might not be able possibly to hear the petitions of His humble suppliants on this lowly globe.

However, I feel too modest to follow the gentleman upon the flight that he has just taken and I want to get back to earth. I want to get back into the House of Representatives, and for that purpose I desire to comment briefly upon a few things which appeared in the RECORD of the other day. In the RECORD of August 21, 1919, on page 4132, at the bottom of the left-hand column, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], in the tungsten-bill debate, is quoted as saying:

> The great trouble in this proposition, at this time, seems to be that the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle are more concerned in the welfare of a particular State and the mines of that State producing tungsten than they are concerned in the prosperity of the entire Union.

The actual language of the gentleman on the floor, as appears by the transcript of the Reporter's notes, is as follows—and there is very little change, but I want to call attention to it:

> The great trouble in this proposition, at this time, seems to be that the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle are more concerned in the welfare of Colorado and the mines in Colorado producing tungsten than they are concerned in the prosperity of the entire Union.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAILE. Certainly.

Mr. DEWALT. I admit that the correction was made, but, in justice to myself, I think the gentleman will permit me to say that certain gentlemen who were deeply interested in the State of Colorado desired me to make the change, and out of politeness and consideration for their feelings I did make the change.

Mr. VAILE. In behalf of my distinguished colleague from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] I thank the gentleman for his consideration of the members of our delegation. I am not contending for a moment that the gentleman's revision was in the least unfair. I think it was much less of a revision than most members would have made. In fact, in a few years I think the gentleman will wish that he had revised his entire speech out of the RECORD. When the laboring people in the district that he represents ask the gentleman why he left it to a Republican majority of this House to protect an industry upon which the industry of Pennsylvania depends, he will wish that he had run a blue pencil through the whole speech before it went to the printer.

I wish to proceed further. The RECORD quotes the gentleman further as saying:

> Is the reason for that concern this, that in 1920 that particular State will be a pivotal State, and they are now electioneering for the vote of that Commonwealth?

What he actually said, according to the Official Reporter, is:

> Is the reason for that concern this, that in 1920 Colorado will be a pivotal State, and that they are now electioneering for the vote of Colorado?

Proceeding further, the gentleman is quoted in the RECORD as follows:

> I come from a district where there are at least 230,000 people working in the steel mills, the cement mills, and in the factories producing the other products which go into the prosperity of this country, and gentlemen on that side of the aisle propose now to legislate for a pocket-borough State, having a population less than one-fifth of that of Pennsylvania, and to protect an industry that is employing only 5,000 men.

The last words as recorded in the notes of the Official Reporter are as follows:

> Gentlemen on that side of the aisle propose now to legislate for a pocket borough called Colorado, to protect an industry that is employing 5,000 men.

I want to discuss for just a moment what a pocket borough is. In the first place, it occurs to me that the objection of my distinguished friend is not really that Colorado is a pocket borough—whatever that may mean—but that this particular Commonwealth, which six years ago was entirely in the pocket of the Democratic Party, which four years ago and three years ago was five-sixths in the pocket of the Democratic Party, is now three-fourths out of that pocket and getting rapidly all the way out. [Applause on the Republican side.] The objection is that it is not still in the rapidly emptying pocket of the Democratic Party. But what is a pocket borough?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VAILE. May I ask two minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. VAILE. Is a pocket borough a State where people have no political independence, no disposition to exercise their own thoughts and judgment? Colorado is not in that class. I can say it has not always been Republican, but I would say for the information of the gentleman that since the Fifty-second Congress there has been only one solid delegation to both Houses, and that was in the Sixty-third. In that year, the candidates being all good men, there was not the usual careful scrutiny which governs the selection of political candidates in Colorado, and six Democrats were elected, as I said a moment ago. Since Colorado was admitted to the Union in 1876 it has been represented by nine Republican and by five Democratic Senators, and by 12 Republican and 11 Democratic Representatives. If the gentleman wants to talk about a pocket borough, I could compare Colorado with a dozen States on the other side of the aisle, and I would even submit to a comparison with the gentleman's own district, which has been most ably represented by himself in this and the two preceding Congresses, and by a Democrat in the five last preceding Congresses, and if he thinks that a State where women have voted for 25 years does not exercise independent judgment I can assure the gentleman that in Pennsylvania, where they soon will vote, he will have an opportunity to revise his opinion on that subject. If you want really to select a pocket borough, I do not mention any particular district, but I would suggest that a district which can furnish a man as a Democratic Representative who can introduce in this House a higher tariff bill than we ever conceived of, who still can come here as a Democrat and be elected term after term, possibly more aptly fulfills that description. [Applause on the Republican side.] I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. After spending the entire day upon the pearl-button bill I would like to ask if we have not exhausted debate on that subject?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER].

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, so much has been said on the subject of the high cost of living that there is perhaps little new to offer as cause or cure.

To the average man the fact of the dollar being worth a trifle less than 50 cents is all sufficient. Inflation of the currency is too technical a subject for understanding by ordinary folks, though many of you Members who are lawyers and bankers and brokers have cultivated the habit of discussing billions with the same ease, grace, and celerity that we everyday folks of ordinary ability and small means speak of buying a suit of clothes for twenty-seven fifty. I look upon the present conditions as a natural sequence following the great crisis through which we have just passed. Raising, training, and equipping an army of 4,000,000 men in 19 months, and helping to transport more than half of them 3,000 miles overseas, was a gigantic undertaking. With every industrial enterprise in the country turning over a part or the whole of its force to the Government, most drastic demands made upon our farmers for increased production, a higher rate of wages paid than we ever dreamed of—surely after such a period of great tension there was certain to be a reaction.

The war is over, but we have not yet paid the bill. Let us fully realize that, for in the excitement of the hour we seem to have forgotten it.

High wages are here to stay; they are not just on a visit. The Republican side of the House desires to perpetuate the principles of high protective tariff, which will help tremendously in enabling American working men and women to live a little better each year and give their children every possible educational opportunity. A protective tariff and high wages go hand in hand.

The distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] scoffs and raves against protective tariff, picturing it as a chasm of iniquity, leading us to believe that the country is on the edge of a precipice, about to fall into primeval chaos, where stars have ceased to shine. But if you say to him, "Mr. KITCHIN, is this really so?" he will answer, "Oh, no; this is not a fact; it is merely a prediction." During the last campaign many anxious and troubled Democratic candidates for Congress, after telling their audiences that tariff was old-fashioned and obsolete, occupied the next hour of their time in endeavoring to explain that point 3—one of the famous 14—"the removal of economic barriers," was not free trade. Harsh criticism of labor unions and organized labor in general is a favorite indoor sport on the Democratic side of the House. Like high wages, organized labor—and they are almost synonymous terms—is here to stay. And it represents in its membership the very backbone of the Nation.

The district which it is my privilege to represent is largely composed of industrial communities; the great General Electric works and the American Locomotive Co. are located there in the city of Schenectady. Organized labor is perhaps stronger there than in any district of its size in the country, and at all times they have been eminently fair. Their membership is the membership of our churches and our fraternal societies—they are our neighbors, and we feel secure in the fact that they will never use unfair means in obtaining their just rights. During three great strikes since 1912, when 23,000 employees walked out, no extra city police were needed, the labor organizations requesting the mayor and commissioner of public safety to swear in 100 of their own members to serve during the strike, which was conducted with no disturbance whatever. These conditions are not the exception; I believe that they are the rule all over the country. High wages and shorter hours mean lessened production and that results in high prices. Give wage earners an interest in the profits, as many concerns are doing, and you will find production speeding up all over the land. I desire at this time to quote from one of our leading magazines to show that while many bills were presented in the Sixty-fourth Congress bearing on the high cost of living, they were buried in committee:

You remember Congress opened with an excited determination to reduce the high cost of living. None of the dozen or more bills to reduce the cost of living have even peeked out of committee rooms, and it is now near the close of the session. Not that any of these bills would have had a great or lasting effect on the cost of living but they did, whether accidentally or not, register the protests that are heard in every part of the country against the continual struggle to meet the expenses of normal appetites and ambitions.

It is difficult to say which Congressman had the best scheme to get the cost of living down within reaching distance. Fitzgerald, of New York, introduced two bills—one advocating the use of the parcel post to send food products to any part of the United States at a low rate of postage; the other for an embargo on farm products, fish, game, and manufactured foodstuffs.

Farr, of Pennsylvania, wanted Congress to give the President power to issue an embargo upon wheat and flour. SABATH, of Illinois, wanted an immediate investigation by the Attorney General to determine the "unreasonable advances" in the prices of foodstuffs, fabrics, paper, and fuel. Borland, of Missouri, wanted the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the "basic facts" relating to the whole works, including production, marketing, and distribution of food supplies. CAMPBELL, of Kansas, was concerned about the high cost of boots and shoes and manufactured leather goods; his idea was to make it unlawful to export any such goods from the United States "for a period of one year." Lindbergh, of Minnesota, was against embargo bills, "as the burden of an embargo would fall most heavily on the farmer." His proposition was to appoint a joint committee of Congress "to investigate the effect upon our resources, supply, and prices, caused by the system of international commerce now practiced."

EMERSON, of Ohio, wanted the Secretary of Agriculture to report "on the advisability to place an embargo on wheat, and so forth." McLEMORE, of Texas, wanted "to forbid the transportation in interstate commerce of food products (except meats and fruits) that have been kept in cold storage more than 90 days." Senator James Hamilton Lewis, in an interview, advocated the seizure of surplus foodstuffs held for speculation. There were many other suggestions, bills, and other schemes.

One man only in this large conclave of thinkers met the issue with a clear, convincing solution. Mr. CHAMP CLARK, when asked by a representative of the press how the people could meet the problem of the high cost of living, replied, "Eat mush," adding that "Everyone who can should keep some hens." If anybody has doubted that CHAMP CLARK is presidential size that doubt must now be dispelled.

For President in 1920: CHAMP CLARK. Democratic platform—mush.

The condition has not entirely changed since then. There is still, two years after, just as great a dearth of acceptable candidates whom you can nominate for the Presidency of the United States. Where will you find him? Who will be the Moses to lead you Democrats once more into the Promised Land, where for six years you have feasted on milk and honey? You will have difficulty in finding him because in every part of this country, gentlemen, the popular indoor sport in 1919 will be the declination of Democratic nominations. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7705) to amend section 339 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, in respect to the tariff on buttons of shell and pearl, and had come to no resolution thereon.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS OF CANADA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks permission of the House to lay before it a letter which has been received by aeroplane mail from the Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada, and which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF COMMONS, CANADA,
Ottawa, August 23, 1919.

To the SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., United States.

MR. SPEAKER: I gladly avail myself of the privilege afforded through the courtesy of the Aero Club of Canada to send you greetings and assurances of good will.

Canadians rejoice in the happy circumstances that for more than a century their relations with their great neighbor have been peaceful and on the whole cordial and friendly; relations which have become more cordial and friendly as methods of intercommunication have improved and we have learned to know each other better.

Therefore this first "international aerial mail service," which no doubt is the forerunner of a continuous service, can not fail to still further cement the friendly ties which bind Canada and the United States.

With every good wish and assurance of highest esteem, believe me,
Faithfully, yours,

EDGAR N. MOORE,
The Speaker House of Commons, Canada.

The reading of the letter was greeted with applause.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GAY. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the New Orleans (La.) Board of Trade (Ltd.) in regard to the protest against the demands made by the railroad brotherhoods to the effect that the railroads should be purchased by the Government and operated for the joint benefit of the railroad employees and the public. I ask that the resolutions be appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the New Orleans Board of Trade (Ltd.), August 13, 1919.

THE NEW ORLEANS BOARD OF TRADE (LTD.).

Whereas representatives of several of the railroad brotherhoods have formulated certain demands upon the Government of the United States to the effect that the railroads should be purchased by the Government and should be operated for the joint benefit of the said railroad employees and the public; and

Whereas this demand was accompanied with an implied threat that unless promptly acceded to a universal strike would be called to coerce the Government into acceptance thereof; and

Whereas during the recent war the experience under Government control and operation of several utilities resulted in a demonstration of lowered efficiency, higher cost, and unsatisfactory service; and

Whereas the New Orleans Board of Trade (Ltd.) is on record as being opposed to governmental ownership and governmental operation of our rail and transportation lines; and

Whereas the railroad brotherhoods' suggestions are entirely along class lines, and their demands carry a threat practically of revolution: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the New Orleans Board of Trade (Ltd.) strongly opposes the demands made by the railroad brotherhoods, and we urge upon and we join with the business interests of our country in calling upon the President and Congress to resist such demands at any cost; and be it further

Resolved, That the president of the board of trade be instructed to forward a copy of these resolutions to President Wilson and to our Representatives and Senators in Congress, requesting and urging their vigorous opposition to any legislation along the lines suggested by the railroad brotherhoods.

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. McCUMBER. What is the request, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

I should like first to look into the question, and I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he will not allow the resolution to lie over until to-morrow?

Mr. GORE. I have no objection to the resolution going over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

ARTICLE OF J. H. FERGUSON.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, in these trying days, when some sections of our Republic are almost an armed camp owing to labor troubles, I wish to call to the attention of the Senate and the American people a remarkably wise and patriotic discussion of existing conditions from the pen of J. H. Ferguson, president of the Baltimore Federation of Labor, published in the Manufacturers Record of the 21st instant, page 90. The editor of the Record says:

LABOR LEADER DEMANDS SANITY AND SAFETY—A REMARKABLY CLEAR STATEMENT FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE BALTIMORE FEDERATION OF LABOR.

(J. H. Ferguson, president of the Baltimore Federation of Labor, has written for the Manufacturers Record one of the sanest and soundest discussions of the whole labor situation which we have seen. If Mr. Ferguson could influence the labor leaders and the so-called labor people to accept and follow his views, all the labor problems of the country would soon be solved, and employers and employees, capital and labor, and all other interests would dwell together in peace and happiness. Mr. Ferguson proclaims the safety of American institutions guarded by those "in the ranks of labor who are Americans by birth or by adoption, and who will not intrust our ship to demagogues, visionaries, or shallow sentimentalists who would steer it on the rocks." The platform which he puts forth is one on which every true American, rich or poor, employer or employee, can stand.—Editor Manufacturers Record.)

[By John H. Ferguson, president Baltimore Federation of Labor.]

"'Reconstruction' has of late been so tiresomely reiterated, not to say violently abused, that it has become to many of us a word of aversion. Politicians, social students, business men, labor men, charity workers, clergymen, and various other social groups have contributed their quota of spoken words and printed pages to the discussion of the subject; yet the majority of us still find ourselves bewildered and helpless. We are unable to say what parts of our social system imperatively need reconstruction, how much of that which is imperatively necessary is likely to be seriously undertaken, or what specific methods and measures are best suited to realize that amount of reconstruction which is at once imperatively necessary and immediately possible.

"I do not believe as many or as great social changes will take place in the United States as in Europe. Neither our habits of thinking nor our ordinary ways of life have undergone a profound disturbance. The hackneyed phrase, 'Things will never be the same since the war,' has a much more concrete and deeply felt meaning among European peoples. Their minds are fully adjusted to the conviction and expectation that these words will come true. In the second place, the devastation, the loss of capital and of men, the changes in individual relations, and the increase in the activities of government have been much greater in Europe than in the United States. Moreover, our superior natural advantages and resources, the better industrial and social condition of our working classes, will constitute an obstacle to anything like revolutionary changes.

"Our present industrial system is destined to last for a long time in its main outlines. That is to say, private ownership of capital is not likely to be supplanted by a collectivist organization of industry at a date sufficiently near to justify any present action based on the hypothesis of its arrival. This is not only extremely probable, but highly desirable; for, other objections apart, Socialism would mean bureaucracy, political tyranny, the helplessness of the individual as a factor in the ordering of his own life, and in general social inefficiency and decadence.

"It is true, there are those in the ranks of organized labor who, in the fervor of their world-improving mission, discover and proclaim certain cure-alls for the ills of humanity, which they fondly and perhaps honestly believe to be new and unfailing remedies, but which, as a matter of fact, are heavy with age, having been tried on this old globe of ours at one time or another, in one of its parts or another, long ago—tried and found wanting and discarded after sad disillusionment. There are the spokesmen of sophomorism, rampant, strutting about in the cloak of superior knowledge, mischievously and noisily, to the disturbance of quiet and orderly mental processes and sane progress. There are the sentimental, unseasoned, intolerant, and cocksure 'advanced thinkers' claiming leave to set the world by the ears, to reconstruct society overnight, and with their strident and ceaseless voices to drown the views of those who are too busy to indulge in much talking. There are the self-seeking demagogues and various related types, and finally there are the devotees of liberty run amuck, who in fanatical obsession would place a visionary and narrow class interest and a sloppy internationalism above patriotism, and with whom class hatred and envy have become a ruling passion. They are perniciously, ceaselessly, and vociferously active and are not representative of labor, either organized or unorganized.

"Among these agitators and disturbers who dare clamorously to assail the majestic and beneficent structure of American traditions, doctrines, and institutions there are some—far too many, indeed—who are of foreign parentage or descent. With many hundreds of thousands, they or their parents came to our free shores from lands of oppression and persecution. The great Republic generously gave them asylum and opened wide to them the portals of her freedom and her opportunities.

"The great bulk of these newcomers have become loyal and enthusiastic Americans. Most of them have proved themselves useful and valuable elements in our many-rooted population. Some of them have accomplished eminent achievements in science, industry, and the arts. Certain of the qualities and talents which they contribute to the common stock are of great worth and promise.

"But some there are who have been blinded by the glare of liberty, as a man is blinded who after long confinement in darkness comes suddenly into the strong sunlight. Blinded, they dare to aspire to force their guidance upon Americans who for generations have walked in the light of liberty. They have become drunk with the strong wine of freedom, these men who until they landed on America's coasts had tasted little but the bitter water of tyranny. Drunk, they presume to impose their reeling gait upon Americans, to whom freedom has been a pure and refreshing fountain for a century and a half.

"Brooding in the gloom of age-long oppression, they have evolved a fantastic and distorted image of free government. In fatuous effrontery they seek to graft the growth of their stunted vision upon the splendid and ancient tree of American institutions. Admitted in generous trust to the hospitality of America, they grossly violate not only the dictates of common gratitude but of those elementary rules of respect and consideration which immemorial custom imposes upon the newcomer or guest. They seek, indeed, to uproot the foundations of the very house which gave them shelter.

"We will not have it so, we in the ranks of labor who are American by birth or by adoption. We reject these impudent pretensions. We propose to move forward and upward, but we shall proceed by the chart of reason, experience, and tested American principles and doctrines, and not intrust our ship to demagogues, visionaries, or shallow sentimentalists, who would steer it on the rocks.

"Strident voices of the fomenters of unrest do not cause me any serious apprehension. Changes we ought to have; changes we shall have. Where there are grievances to redress, where there are wrongs existing, we must all aid in trying to right them to the best of our conscience and ability. To the extent that social and economic institutions, however deep and ancient their roots, may be found to stand in the way of the highest achievable level of social justice and the widest attainable extension of opportunity, welfare, and contentment, they will have to submit to change. And the less obstructive and stubborn, the more broad-minded, cooperative, sympathetic, and disinterested those who preeminently prospered under the old conditions will prove themselves in meeting the spirit of the new day and the reforms which it may justly call for, the better it will be both for them and the community at large.

"'Society,' said Pope Leo XIII, 'can be healed in no other way than by a return to Christian life and Christian institutions.' The truth of these words is more widely perceived to-day than when they were written, more than 27 years ago. Changes in our economic and political systems will have only partial and feeble efficiency if they be not reinforced by the Christian view of work and wealth. No program of betterment will prove reasonably effective without a reform in the spirit of both capital and labor. The laborer must come to realize that he owes his employer and society an honest day's work in return for a fair wage, and that conditions can not be substantially improved until he roots out the desire to get a maximum of return for a minimum of service. The capitalist must likewise get a new viewpoint. He needs to learn the long-forgotten truth that wealth is stewardship, that profit making is not the basic justification of business enterprise, and that there are such things as fair profits, fair interest, and fair prices. Above and before all, he must cultivate and strengthen within his mind the truth which many of his class have already begun to grasp; namely, that the laborer is a human being, not merely an instrument of production, and that the laborer's right to a decent livelihood is the first moral charge upon industry.

"I shall work with all my strength to bring about changes as the needs of the people become apparent. I shall earnestly strive to realize what formerly were considered unattainable ideals. But I shall do all this in the American way of sane and orderly progress, and in no other."

Mr. President, in the efforts of labor to accomplish the reforms it seeks, if it shall proceed in the old-fashioned American way of "sane and orderly progress, and no other," as suggested by Mr. Ferguson, it will have the sympathetic assistance of all fair-minded people and will attain its ends much quicker than by resort to threats and force, and, indeed, it can never attain them by violence.

EX-PRESIDENT TAFT'S REPLY TO SENATOR LODGE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I note in the Washington Post of this morning a letter from ex-President William Howard Taft, which is an exhaustive reply to a speech made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECOLD as follows:

TAFT SAYS SENATOR LODGE'S SPEECHES ARE INCONSISTENT; ANSWERS TREATY ARGUMENTS—PURPOSES OF FIVE GREAT POWERS IN LEAGUE TOTALLY UNLIKE THOSE OF HOLY ALLIANCE; SAYS ARTICLE 3 DOES NOT ENLARGE POWERS AS CHARGED BY SENATOR—FORMER PRESIDENT INTERPRETS ARTICLES 10 AND 11—DECLARES NATIONS MUST CONTINUE LEAGUE ENTERED INTO TO CONDUCT WAR AND NOW FRAMED FOR PEACE.

[By William Howard Taft.]

"Senator LODGE'S speech on the league of nations is an important event in the history of the issue over the ratification of the treaty and the covenant of the league. In point of continuous service he is the oldest Member of Congress, as he is one of the ablest, and he is the longest in experience upon the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate. What he says, therefore, is entitled to great weight. But the Senator can not complain if those who differ with him seek to break the force of what he says by pointing out action and speech by him in the past quite inconsistent with his present attitude. Nor will the claim that his prestige and experience give his arguments and conclusions immunity from analysis and answer. Indeed, the speech of Senator WILLIAMS, impromptu as it was and marred as it was by its personal references to Mr. LODGE, answered with all the vigor of the debater much of what Mr. LODGE in his carefully prepared address had urged. Mr. WILLIAMS'S remarks were directed toward the trend of Mr. LODGE'S speech and his general attitude, rather than to his carefully drawn objections to particular articles of the covenant.

HOLY ALLIANCE ANALOGY FALSE.

"The first great argument of Mr. LODGE against the league was based on the analogy between this league and the Holy Alliance, in which he emphasized the declarations by its constituent absolute monarchs of their high purpose and noble ends in the maintenance of the alliance, and then showed that for 35 years the result of its machinations was a curse to the world.

"It needs no profound knowledge of history to realize how lacking in force and fairness such an argument by analogy is. The Holy Alliance was created for the purpose of keeping on the thrones of Europe occupants who were legitimate heirs in their divine right of ruling and of preventing revolution against them. It was a conspiracy of absolute monarchs to maintain the rule of their class.

"Mr. LODGE objects that the five great powers will control this league as the Holy Alliance was controlled. Five great powers are given large influence in the management of the policy of this league. It must be so, and it ought to be so, because they are the ones upon whom the burden of maintaining the prestige and influence of the league for good is to be heaviest. But whatever is to be done by them must be done by unanimous action. Can we conceive of the United States, Great Britain, and France, ruled by their peoples as they are, uniting to work such purposes as disgraced and broke up the Holy Alliance?

DENIES UNLIMITED POWER.

"The first provision of the league which Senator LODGE attacks is a paragraph from article 3, reading as follows:

"The assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

"He urges that this confers unlimited power upon the league and greatly enlarges the field of action in which we shall be involved even beyond that in which the Holy Alliance was engaged. This view can not be sustained. The meaning of this paragraph is, of course, to be determined not only by the words used but also by the immediate context and its relation to the rest of the covenant.

"Article 3 is an article prescribing the organization and procedure of the assembly. Article 4 is an article performing the same office in respect to the council. They describe the membership, the times and places of the meetings, the subjects matter to be considered and dealt with at each meeting, and the voting power and number of representatives of each member for the respective bodies. The subjects matter which may be dealt with at any meeting of either are described in exactly the same words for both bodies, to wit, 'any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.'

"By article 5 decisions of the council must be by unanimous vote of representatives present at the meeting. The object of this language is, therefore, to notify members of the league and their representatives in the council or assembly that the whole business of the league is in order to be considered at any meeting without special notice, and that their interests may be affected in their absence. This signification is emphasized by the clause immediately following that in question in article 4, which provides that any member with no representative in the council must be invited to send a representative to any meeting at which matters affecting it are to be considered. This is not necessary in the case of the assembly, because every member has a representative in the assembly.

POWERS ARE UNCHANGED.

"The general language quoted by Senator LODGE in article 3 and the identical language in article 4 are thus merely to put members on notice of what may be considered at every meeting. In neither article is the language to be treated as an independent grant of power. The functions and powers of the assembly and the council are what they are elsewhere in the covenant defined to be, and are no greater by reason of this clause. Otherwise the assembly and the council would have the same functions and the same powers, for the language of the clause as to each is the same. Every other article of the covenant shows this not to be the case. The clause cited by Senator LODGE neither enlarges the jurisdiction of the league nor the obligations of its members beyond their specific limitation as set out in other articles.

REPLIES TO IRISH ARGUMENT.

"Again, article 11 is relied upon by the Senator to show that it is the purpose of the league to interfere to suppress rebellions and revolutions. Thus Ireland, it is thought, can be brought in. The first sentence of the article reads as follows:

"Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations. In case any such emergency should arise, the secretary general shall, on the request of any member of the league, forthwith summon a meeting of the council.

"The council is summoned to advise the members of the league what ought to be done, and its advice must be unanimous, and upon that advice the members are to act in their discretion and to perform their obligations under the covenant of the league as they in good faith understand them. Such a provision does not enlarge the obligations of the members; it only provides for prompt cooperation in an emergency which may be the occasion upon which under other articles of the league the members may act.

NO EFFECT ON REBELLIONS.

"Such a case, for instance, as a war between two countries not members of the league might certainly affect the peace of nations. Nor need it be denied that where internal disturbance, as a Bolshevist upturning of society, becomes militant and seeks to upturn society of neighboring nations, this might well be made a matter of concern to the whole league. But there is nothing from these words or any other part of the covenant which brings an internal rebellion or revolution within the jurisdiction of the league. 'War or threat of war' contained in article 11 means something that affects the international relations between countries. This is clearly shown by its last clause, in which it is also declared to be the fundamental right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threaten to disturb either the peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

RESTRICTS MEMBERS' DUTIES.

"If article 11 is to have the construction which Senator LODGE maintains and is to refer to internal rebellions and revolutions, then it is very strange that the fundamental right of each member of the league is to bring to the attention of the assembly or the council under article 11 only those circumstances which disturb international relations and the peace and the good understanding between nations.

"To support his view Senator LODGE refers to the provision in the treaty with Germany which requires Poland and the Czech and other States to make treaties with the five great powers guaranteeing the religious and other rights of minorities. This does not at all indicate a purpose on the part of the league to intervene in the internal affairs of nations generally. Poland and the Czech States are new nations born of the war and this treaty, the record of whose peoples in respect to religious intolerance and oppression of the Jews and others has not been good. But the treaty power is to be vested in untried and unrestrained majorities. It is of the highest importance to the effectiveness of the treaty that these nations be made stable bulwarks against German plots, and such a guaranty will serve to steady them.

DOES NOT ADD TO COVENANT.

"The example for such a guaranty was set in the congress of Berlin in the establishment of Roumania, Bulgaria, and Serbia as independent nations. It is a special provision, and leaves to the five great powers the obligation to enforce the guaranty in favor of minorities in countries whose birth and maintenance the signatories to the treaty who won the war are responsible. It does not in any degree enlarge the meaning of the covenant as applied to its members generally.

"Senator LODGE objects to the failure in the covenant to amplify the jurisdiction of the court provided in the league, and to provide a tribunal for hearing justiciable questions. This is a fair criticism of the league, and it is a defect in the plan—a defect which may be cured by amendment, and which, we may hope, will be so cured. In respect to justiciable questions, it would have been much better to have a judicial court, as Mr. Root pointed out, to which all members should be obliged to resort, remitting unjusticiable questions to the council.

"The first steps to be taken after the league is adopted should be to perfect its machinery in this regard. But it seems quite unwarranted to argue, as Senator LODGE does, that the action of the council or assembly in respect to justiciable questions is to be determined on political or diplomatic grounds, and not as an impartial body controlled by the principles of international law. Justiciable questions are those which in their nature are capable of settlement on principles of international law.

"The preamble recites the purpose of the league to be the 'prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations,' 'the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as to the actual rule of conduct among governments,' and 'the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one or another.'

"Article 13 declares as among those suitable for arbitration certain justiciable questions in language suggested by Mr. Root, as follows:

"Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach.

PROVIDES FOR ARBITRATION.

"The article imposes on parties to a dispute the duty of agreeing to submit to arbitration questions 'which they recognize as suitable for arbitration.' Even if this article be held not to require a party to a controversy to submit such justiciable questions as are here specified to arbitration, as may well be affirmatively argued, certainly it is most unwarranted to claim that when such justiciable questions are carried to the council or assembly for settlement the recommendation of that body is not to be governed by principles of international law, and the function of the tribunal in disposing of them is not to be judicial. The fact that the representatives of the parties to the dispute are to be left out of the council or assembly in reaching the needed unanimity of conclusion confirms the judicial character of the function.

"Calling for another league than this league because of this and other defects, Senator LODGE urges:

"Let us unite with the world to promote the peaceful settlement of all international disputes. Let us try to develop international law. Let us associate ourselves with other nations for these purposes.

FINDS SENATOR INCONSISTENT.

"This criticism and language sounds a bit strange coming from a Senator who helped to defeat the general arbitration treaties made between the United States and France and the United States and Great Britain, which provided for a settlement of all justiciable issues arising between them and a means of determining whether a question arising was justiciable or not. These treaties were loaded down with such exceptions that it seemed of no use whatever to invite the acquiescence of France and Great Britain in the narrowing amendments that were insisted on in the Senate and supported and voted for by Senator LODGE.

"Senator LODGE says that the amendment to the covenant as originally reported, which excludes from the consideration of the council or the assembly any issue which by international law is purely domestic, is intended to deceive. The exception was obviously put in for the purpose of excluding immigration and tariff from among the issues which the council or assembly might consider in a dispute.

CITES SUPREME COURT RULING.

"The Supreme Court of the United States has said that it is an accepted maxim of international law that immigration is a purely domestic question, as well as the imposition of tariffs. But Senator LODGE is not willing to trust the council or the assembly to follow this accepted maxim in excluding from its jurisdiction such questions. He is afraid that one honest and impartial representative on the council can not be found who, on the plea of the United States, would uphold this accepted maxim of international law in determining the jurisdiction of the council.

"This unwillingness to assume that any other disinterested nation in the world of all the nations will be fair in dealing with the lawful rights of the United States is characteristic of the attitude of Senator LODGE and those who agree with him. Is this uniting 'with the world to promote the peaceful settlement of all international disputes'? Is this trying 'to develop international law'? Is this 'associating ourselves with other nations for these purposes'?

DEFENDS ARTICLE 10.

"Senator LODGE attacks article 10. He says it will enable the King of Arabia, Hussein, Sultan of Hejaz, to appeal to us to come and help him defend his boundary against the attacks of Arabs in his neighborhood. This is not a fair construction of article 10. All the language of article 10 should be read together. It looks to joint operation of the members of the league. It says:

"The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

"In other words, the members are to cooperate and the council is to form a plan for their cooperation. Under that no nation will be obliged to act except upon the advice of the council, and the advice of the council would limit the extent of its obligation.

"The action of the council, however, is only advisory, and therefore it would still remain for the members in good faith to determine how far they deemed it their duty to act upon such advice under the obligations of the article. Of course, for us Congress would have to determine how far it would act upon such advice and what in its judgment was its obligation under the article to comply with such advice. It does not seem a fair construction of the article to say that it constitutes a direct obligation between a nation whose integrity or independence is attacked and every other member of the league. It is a league matter, the members responding to carry out a league purpose under the cooperating advice of the council of the league.

QUOTES JUSTICE HUGHES.

"Mr. Justice Hughes, in the reservations which he has suggested to Senator HALE, has given a very excellent construction of what this article 10 means. He says:

"Fourth. That the meaning of article 10 of the covenant of the league of nations is that the members of the league are not under any obligation to act in pursuance of said article except as they may decide to act upon the advice of the council of the league. The United States of America assumes no obligation under said article to undertake any military expedition or to employ its armed forces on land or sea unless such action is authorized by the Congress of the United States of America, which has exclusive authority to declare war or to determine for the United States of America whether there is any obligation on its part under said article, and the means or action by which any such obligation shall be fulfilled.

"Such an interpretation shows that the illustration of Senator LODGE is really fanciful. As the action of the council is to be unanimous, and as the United States has a member on it, the character of its advice must, of course, be reasonable. Those nations in the neighborhood and more directly interested in the Arabian kingdom are the ones whom the council would doubtless advise to take action in pursuance of article 10 in such a case. The council would not attempt to draw the United States in until the trouble growing out of the disturbance bade fair to involve world consideration.

SENATOR CHANGES ATTITUDE.

"Senator LODGE objects to the United States binding itself by war or boycott to cooperate with other nations in suppressing war. This is contrary to his attitude when he delivered an address at a dinner of the League to Enforce Peace in Washington in 1916, at which both he and President Wilson agreed that it was necessary to unite the forces of the world to suppress war. Nor was his judgment at that time doubtful. On the contrary, he enforced the firmness of his conviction by the quotation from Matthew Arnold:

"Charge once more, then, and be dumb;
Let the victors when they come,
When the forts of folly fall,
Find the body by the wall.

"His present attitude is a departure, too, from the position which he took in his commencement address at Union College, in 1915, in which he said that there was no other means by which the peace of the world could be maintained except by a union of nations to enforce peace.

IGNORES OBJECT OF LEAGUE.

"Now the Senator's position is that the United States can better contribute to the peace of the world by staying out of every such union and not involving itself in any obligation to act until the occasion shall arise when it may then determine what it will do. In this he ignores the central feature of any useful league of nations to secure peace. The object of a league is to convince those who would disturb the peace of nations that if they persist in such a course the union of the nations will inflict on them the penalty of forcible restraint. Its purpose is not to make war—its purpose is to threaten the use of lawful force to restrain lawless violence. It is the minatory, cautionary effect of the league that is essentially and highly important.

"It is this feature of the Monroe doctrine that has made it so successful. It was the knowledge that the United States would fight, if need be, to assert the doctrine that has preserved it and peace for now near a century. But if the United States is to stay out of this league and not obligate itself in any way to add to the weight and sanction of the league, then much of the usefulness of the covenant is gone.

MEANS DRIFTING POLICY.

"As Senator WILLIAMS says, the attitude of the United States in such a case is merely drifting and waiting until we are driven into a position in which we must fight, as we were driven into this war.

"More than this, the Senator's contention that the United States can do more good by staying out of the league than by going in ignores the fact that unless the United States enters the league it will cease to be a league of nations and will become only an alliance and will stimulate the formation of other alliances and future war. It is the world-surpassing strength of the United States in its intelligent people and its resources, in its military potentiality, and in its comparative disinterestedness as between all other nations which makes its membership indispensable to a world league. For us to refuse to enter it is to take the responsibility of destroying its possibility. If our real interests require it, of course we should refuse; but in determining our real interests we should face this responsibility.

SHOULD NOT FEAR DEFINITION.

"Senator LODGE objects to the reservation of the Monroe doctrine contained in the covenant. It is very difficult to understand the attitude of Senator LODGE and many others with respect to the Monroe doctrine. He says that the instant the United States, which declared, interpreted, and sustained the doctrine, ceases to be the sole judge of what it means, that instant the Monroe doctrine ceases and disappears from history and from the face of the earth. He then quotes from Theodore Roosevelt 'that we are in honor bound to keep ourselves so prepared that the Monroe doctrine shall be accepted as immutable international law.' Senator LODGE objects to the recognition of the Monroe doctrine by anybody else. He objects to its definition. How can it become 'immutable international law' unless it has definition and terms?

"The essence of law, whether municipal or international or immutable, is its definition as a rule of action. The Monroe doctrine certainly affects the relations between non-American nations and American nations. It is certainly a limitation upon the right of American nations to part with territory and independence to non-American nations and of the right of non-American nations to secure by force or bargain transfer of such territory or independence.

NOT MERE DOMESTIC POLICY.

"If it is to become immutable international law, then it must become a rule of action both for American and non-American nations. How can they act within it unless they know what it is? The doctrine is not a mere domestic policy. It relates directly to international relations between certain classes of nations. Now, the attitude of Senator LODGE and others, if one can understand them, is not that it is for us to say what those relations shall be and for us to refuse to define what those relations shall be in advance, but to decide when the occasion arises what we think they ought to be. This is to make the doctrine not immutable international law. It is to make it an arbitrary decree, ex post facto.

"It is the language of absolutism. It is to make the doctrine as offensive to non-American nations and to American nations other than ourselves as possible.

"For the first time we have in the covenant a full recognition of the Monroe doctrine as something which this covenant is not to affect or interfere with. Yet we even resent its recognition and decline to say what it is. Why in the name of all that is fair and reasonable should we not now interpret what it means, as we may in a reservation, and let the world which wishes to recognize and conform to it know what it is?

NO DISPUTE ON WITHDRAWAL.

"The question of withdrawal from the league, upon which Senator LODGE dwells, is not one that calls for much controversy, because there seems to be a general agreement that it may easily be interpreted by reservations to mean that the United States shall cease to be a member of the league as soon as the notice for two years expires, and that any failure on the part of the United States to comply with international law or the obligations of the league shall not prevent the cessation of membership, but only be made the basis for a claim for damages against the United States if any such exists.

"Nor is it necessary elaborately to discuss Senator LODGE's Americanism, in the maintenance of which he declares that his own country first commands his allegiance. He does not differ from most other Americans in that respect, nor does support of the covenant mark a line of distinction between false and true Americanism. It is perfectly consistent with a love of country and with a preference of the interests of one's country over those of all other nations to favor a union of nations to maintain peace.

NO LESS AMERICAN IN 1915.

"When Senator LODGE advocated this at the dinner of the League to Enforce Peace or at the commencement exercises of Union College in 1915 he was not any less an American than he is to-day. Nor are those who favor the league any less American than he is. Those who support the league think they are exalting their country in making it properly useful for the maintenance of the peace of the world, in the benefits of which their country will certainly share, and they believe they have a broader vision of the noble purposes which the United States may serve when they would have it take its stand with the other nations of the world to avoid the scourge of war and secure a peace which will work for the benefit of all.

"It should be noted that Senator LODGE does not dwell on any unconstitutional feature of the covenant. This is hardly in accord with the recitals of Senator KNOX's resolutions, which Mr. LODGE voted for in committee and reported to the Senate. He now takes the stand with Mr. Root, who also ignores the constitutional objections, and so, I believe, does Mr. Justice Hughes.

"If there had been any doubt in anyone's mind on the subject of the constitutionality of the covenant reasonably construed, it should be removed by a perusal of the very learned and useful discussion of these issues by Senator KELLOGG in his speech, reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 8, and in the earlier convincing arguments of Senators MCCUMBER, COLT, and MCNARY.

"A noteworthy omission in Senator LODGE's speech is of any suggestion as to how the treaty with Germany is to be enforced, how the limitation of her armament is to be secured, how the stability of the nations created by the treaty can be maintained in accord with the strategic necessities of a permanent peace with Germany, luminously pointed out by Mr. LODGE in his speech on the proper scope of a treaty of peace made soon after the armistice, or how the spread of Bolshevism, which he deprecated and wished restrained, can be met.

TREATY BACKS WAR PURPOSE.

"Neither he nor any opponent of the league seems to regard the treaty of peace as something to be executed. Its chief function now is to furnish objects of critical attack. Surely the United States fought the war to achieve a great purpose. Surely the treaty of peace is to be the embodiment and clinching of that purpose. Surely the treaty imposed upon an unwilling Germany and the other treaties imposed upon reluctant Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey will not enforce themselves. Who must enforce them, then? The nations who fought the war.

"They must continue the league entered into to conduct the war and now amended and framed to maintain the peace they won. This is the essence of the covenant, and upon it as a firm foundation the rearing of a structure protecting the world against war is a great opportunity and an easy and natural step in the advance of Christian civilization."

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I also ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD in the same connection an article from the Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, Pa., which is headed, "LODGE, fears the covenant but forgets Sarajevo."

There being no objection, the article referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

"LODGE FEARS THE COVENANT BUT FORGETS SARAJEVO—WE ARE 'ENTANGLED' ALREADY—WILL WE HELP UNRAVEL THE SNARL OR LET IT TRIP US AGAIN?

"No one will be surprised that the Senate galleries cheered LODGE. It was a rattling good speech. The Senator from Massachusetts is an able man, and this set address was the result of months of study and preparation. As steadfast believers in the league of nations, we are quite willing to admit that it was as strong, as appealing, as effective, an attack upon the league covenant as could be made.

"We have referred to ourselves as 'believers' in the league of nations; but we do not claim any offensive superiority in this regard over Senator LODGE, who addressed an audience at Union College in June, 1915, when the Great War had been raging for nearly a year, and who, as the New York World reminds us, held on that occasion the entrancing language of idealism in the following fashion:

"'Nations must unite as men unite in order to preserve peace and order. The great nations must be so united as to be able to say to any single country, "You must not go to war"; and they can say that effectively when the country desiring war knows that the force which the united nations place behind peace is irresistible. * * * It may seem Utopian at this moment to suggest a union of civilized nations in order to put a controlling force behind the maintenance of peace and international order, but it is through the aspirations for perfection, through the search of Utopias, that the real advances have been made. At all events it is along this path that we must travel if we are to attain in any measure to the end we all desire of peace upon earth.

"Nor do we assail Mr. LODGE for changing his mind. If he had confined himself to detailed criticism of the covenant as 'a deformed experiment upon a noble purpose,' we would, indeed, have gladly greeted him as one who stands for the principle but is dissatisfied with the application immediately in hand. That might easily occur—especially when the application bears the name of 'Wilson.' But the Senator went much beyond that. He preached the narrow gospel of nationalism with an unction that points to relish rather than reluctance, and with a remarkable forgetfulness of the chief achievement of the war—the unescapable 'entanglement of America * * * in the intrigues of Europe.' We have no choice in the matter. We never did have. Germany dragged us into the conflict; and the iron necessity of making very sure that our boys did not die in vain fetters us firmly to the task of fighting on with the forces that seek to bring ordered peace out of tumultuous and terror-ridden chaos.

"Says Senator LODGE:

"'I will go as far as any one in world service, but the first step to world service is the maintenance of the United States. You may call me selfish, if you will, conservative or reactionary, but an American I was born, an American I have remained all my life.

"'I can never be anything else but an American, and I must think of the United States first, and when I think of the United States first in an arrangement like this I am thinking of what is best for the world, for if the United States fails the best hopes of mankind fall with it. I have never had but one allegiance—I can not divide it now.

"No wonder the galleries cheered. Who could say otherwise? We are all Americans first. But does the Senator believe that America would now be worse off if she had been 'entangled' in a league of nations during the summer of 1914 which would have been able to tell the Hapsburg Government of Austria-Hungary that its ultimatum to Serbia was a war-provoking act which must be withdrawn if it did not desire to encounter the condemnation of the league? Does he believe if Germany and Austria had known at that time that any wanton precipitation of war on their part would bring into the field against them automatically not only Britain, France, and Russia, but Italy and the United States as well, that they would have rushed on their fate? The same thing would be true if it had been Russia that then thought of 'lifting the lid off hell.' The 'union of civilized nations' with 'a controlling force behind the maintenance of peace,' which Senator LODGE so eloquently envisaged at Union College, would have kept the peace.

"And America, which we must think of first, would have been the richer to-day by many tens of thousands of 'dead,' hundreds of thousands of 'wounded,' and billions of dollars. We paid a big price to learn the lesson that we live in the world, and no Senator can sing sweetly enough to cause us to forget for a moment that so long as America does not lend her sanity and power to the proper control of what Mr. LODGE calls so contemptuously 'every controversy and conflict on the face of the globe,' she abstains at the cost of risking the life of every American lad who leaves his home this morning with a bright face turned toward the day's duty or pleasure.

"The Senator makes superficially telling points by reading the news from distant Arabia and distracted Poland and asking whether we are willing to put it in the power of King Hussein, for instance, to compel us to send American soldiers to Arabia to fight for the boundaries of his plastic kingdom. The answer is easy. We are not. We are not willing to put it in the power of any foreign prince, potentate, or parliament to send one American marine into action. Congress will continue to control the vital questions of peace and war for us under the league precisely as it has in the past. * * *

"But the case of Arabia, which the Senator has invoked, is an excellent one for him to consider. Has it occurred to him that King Hussein might literally 'compel' American troops to go to war if there were no league in existence? Less important men than the new Arabian King have done that. An assassin lurking in a doorway in by no means metropolitan Sarajevo 'compelled' 2,000,000 Americans to arm and go to France. Some will never come back unless in their coffins. The same King Hussein has immense powers for mischief under his hand. Does the Senator forget that he is the political heir of Mohammed, and that it was the Arabs who once so seriously frightened Christendom? He might, for example, take it into his head to fight the French for Damascus or to try to drive the Armenians back to the Caucasus. A league of nations could easily bring pressure to bear, without asking so much as a company of infantry from America, which would dissuade him. But if there were no league of nations, no big-power unity of action, rather big-power jealousies and intrigues, it is just possible that the conflagration might spread until America must again buckle on her armor and pour out much of her best blood on European battle fields.

"It seems impossible to believe that there is any real and vital divergence of opinion on this subject of a league of civilization for the simple purpose of self-preservation. All of the Lodge 'reservations' do not seriously alter the league covenant. They would do little harm if they were presented so as to avoid delay. The American people are all with him for 'America first'; but men of light and leading ought to unite in telling the American people frankly that the day of American isolation is past forever, and that it is only a question on what particular terms we will join the parliament of man.

"We can not stand aloof. We can not shirk the risks. Immensely greater risks will menace us if we do. We must 'chip in.' We must pool our brains and our hearts and our strong right arms. We must join the forces of prevention, as well as the forces which subsequently fight the flames on dizzy ladders. We can not afford to split hairs and chop logic over definitions of Monroe doctrines or what are or are not domestic questions. * * *"

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a communication from Judge S. Harrison White, of the Colorado bar, inclosing certain resolutions recently adopted at a meeting of the Colorado branch of the League to Enforce Peace. I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Whereas the United States of America entered the World War for the express purpose of making the world a safe place in which to live; and

"Whereas this high purpose involved two objectives—the crushing of militarism and the placing of the political forces of the world under the control of international law; and

"Whereas the first objective has been accomplished, and the only feasible and practicable plan whereby the second may be obtained is presented and embodied in the proposed covenant for a league of nations interwoven into the treaty of peace:

"Now, therefore, this body of citizens of Colorado, here assembled, 600 in number, declares that in our opinion the treaty of peace should be considered without bias or political partisanship and promptly ratified, to the end that peace may speedily come, normal conditions reappear, and a reasonable hope may arise in the minds and hearts of men that in the future nations may not go to war until every reasonable means of settling their disputes shall have been fully and fairly tried.

"STATE OF COLORADO,
"City and county of Denver, ss:

"I, S. Harrison White, hereby certify that I was the chairman and presided at a meeting of citizens of Denver, held in the Albany Hotel Auditorium on Tuesday evening, August 19, 1919, under the auspices of the Colorado branch of the League to Enforce Peace, and at said meeting the above and foregoing resolutions were adopted, and the chairman instructed to send a copy of the same to the Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS, United States Senator, and to the Hon. LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS, United States Senator, Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

"Dated at Denver, Colo., this 20th day of August, 1919.

"S. HARRISON WHITE."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I present a short article from the New York Herald of August 20, which I ask may be read by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the New York Herald, Aug. 20, 1919.]

THE GENESIS OF THE LEAGUE.

"The writer of the third letter asks some questions which should furnish food for thought. He signs himself 'An American Democrat' because he is one. By way of further identification the Herald can say that he is one of the most prominent members of the Democratic Party, not, however, an officeholder or a seeker of office. Because of his prominence and the importance of the questions his letter raises, it is here reproduced in full:

"'To the Editor of the Herald:

"'Have our statesmen had occasion to observe the development of the British colonial system into a league of nations?

"'The British Empire is now a league of nations. British statesmen have had long experience in control of the existing league.

"'Should the United States be induced to become incorporated in the proposed new league, its relation to the existing league of English-speaking nations would be difficult to define or maintain.

"'Could we, the only English-speaking Nation now independent of the existing league, avoid being assimilated by it and its other members?

"'Could we maintain a policy of friendly independence toward the British Empire and the Continent of Europe, or would the control of our policy pass from us?

"'AN AMERICAN DEMOCRAT.'

"May not the situation which 'An American Democrat' presents so tersely explain the support which the league covenant, with its six British votes to one American, is receiving in certain circles in Boston and in Washington?"

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 5818. An act for the retirement of public-school teachers in the District of Columbia was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, on yesterday afternoon we listened to the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and I then gave notice that I would have a few observations to make this morning, more upon the tenor of his remarks, more upon the spirit exhibited by the Senator, than upon the text.

Mr. President, each of us is under a nervous strain; many of us are engaged in the performance of our labors until the late hours of the night, and I realize the fact that we are prone or are likely to say more than we have in mind, possibly, and more than we really mean. But all through this debate, from its inception to the present time, culminating, I may say, in the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota on yesterday, there has run a strain of impatience with those who did not agree with everything contained in the treaty which is now pending before us.

I want to say here, in order that people may know it, that at the first meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee, sir, Senators sat down at the table admitting that they had never read the treaty which was placed before them, and yet they were prepared to vote upon it. Some impatience was displayed with the insistence of other Senators that the treaty should be read openly before the committee, and one or two of the Senators were sincere enough to admit that it might well be read, as they had never read it. Yet some of those Senators had been debating the treaty in this body and on the forum, and those Senators themselves are the most impatient with others who would find objection to any article of the treaty. Amongst those Senators who have spoken in advocacy of the treaty without ever having read it will be found those who are most impatient with those who would read it and have the people of the United States understand it.

Words of scorn have been heard rather than argument in this body and out of it by those who advocate the adoption of this treaty, who are urging most impatiently that the Senate should immediately come to a vote upon it, and who are insisting that delay is being caused in the consideration of the treaty by Senators who persist in endeavoring to have some understanding of it through the securing of evidence upon the different propositions or for other reasons satisfactory to themselves.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I should be glad to hear from the Senator what the objectionable features of the treaty are. Does he object to the reparation provisions? Does he object to the disarmament provisions? Does he object to the granting of Alsace-Lorraine to France? Does he object to the restoration to Denmark of northern Schleswig? Does he object to the establishment of an independent government in Poland? I should like to know what parts of the treaty, outside of academic matters pertaining to the league of nations, are objectionable.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I will only answer the Senator at this moment by calling attention——

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say one thing, and I will say it now. There is no use of attempting to chop up this treaty into mincemeat. If that is the Senator's object, he will find when it gets in here before the Senate that the mincemeat will be wiped out of it.

Mr. FALL. Well, Mr. President, there is no reason for the Senator taking advantage of his age and of his experience to undertake to talk to the Senator from New Mexico in that manner.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator need not pay any attention to my age; he may consider me the youngest man in the Senate.

Mr. FALL. If second childhood meant that, possibly I would. However, I have no desire to get into any controversy with the Senator. I will simply point to the Senator's own action. A few days since the Senate referred to a committee having in jurisdiction of the matter whatsoever a question concerning the pending French treaty. A report has been drawn by the subcommittee upon the pending French treaty, and in that report, signed by the Senator who has just spoken, no reference whatsoever is made to the matter which concerns the Senate the most seriously, nor was any consideration given by the subcommittee—so I have been told by other members—and no report was made by the subcommittee upon the important question as to whether the Senate of the United States would have a right to ratify a treaty by the consent of a council of the league of nations instead of by itself under its own constitutional authority. The report written and signed by the Senator is silent upon the question which is most interesting to the people of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to ask the Senator a question. Will he yield?

Mr. FALL. I yield for a question.

Mr. NELSON. I understood the Senator to say that I was in my second childhood. I should like to have him explain that.

Mr. FALL. I did not say that. I said that if I took the Senator at his word I might consider that he was in his second childhood, or words to that effect. I apologize for anything personal that the Senator may have understood me to say.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator that I am neither in my second childhood in this matter nor as to the Mexican situation.

Mr. FALL. Very well, Mr. President. Then I will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that he has pending before the Committee on Foreign Relations a request forwarded by him that foreigners be heard upon the disposition of the Aland Islands, which is one of the matters which the Senate has before it for consideration and one of the matters which necessarily delay the consideration of the treaty.

Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Minnesota and to the Senator from North Dakota, those two Senators on this side, and to Senators on the other side that I recommend to them, if I may, that they read Solomon. I recommend to them for their consideration one of his proverbs:

> Scornful men ensnare a city; but wise men prevent calamity.

I was very much interested in reading several years ago—and to refresh my memory I have read again recently—an essay by one of the world's great statesmen and great writers, who took this proverb for a text. It is true that this man wrote over 200 years ago, but it is nevertheless true that his words are yet read with profit by statesmen, while some would-be statesmen have possibly never heard of him. Francis Bacon, taking Solomon's proverb for his text, commented as follows—and I recommend his comment to the serious consideration of some of our statesmen of the present day:

> Scornful men ensnare a city; but wise men prevent calamity. (Proverbs xxix, 8.)

Bacon says:

> It may seem strange that Solomon, in the description of men formed as it were by nature for the destruction of States, should choose the character not of a proud and haughty, not of a tyrannical and cruel, not of a rash and violent, not of a seditious and turbulent, not of a foolish and incapable man, but the character of a scorner. Yet this choice is becoming the wisdom of that king, who well knew how governments were subverted and how preserved, for there is scarce such another destructive thing to kingdoms and commonwealths as that of the counselors or senators who sit at the helm should be (naturally) scorners; who to show themselves courageous advisers are always extenuating the greatness of dangers, insulting as fearful those who weigh them as they ought, and ridiculing the refining delays of counsel and debate as tedius matters of oratory and unserviceable to the general issue of business. * * * They account the power and authority of laws but nets unfit to hold great matters. They reject as dreams and melancholy motions those counsels of precautions that regard futurity at a distance. They satirize and banter such men as are really prudent and knowing in affairs of state or such as * * * are capable of advising. In short, they sap all the foundations of political government at once—a thing which deserves the greater attention, as it is not effected by open attack but by secret undermining; nor is it, by any means, so much suspected among mankind as it deserves.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I ask the Senator who is the author of the essay to which he has referred?

Mr. FALL. Lord Francis Bacon.

Mr. WOLCOTT. He was, if I recall, said to be the wisest as well as the meanest of mankind.

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir; Lord Verulam, the younger son of Sir Nicholas Bacon, prime minister of England, and himself prime minister. The Senator has correctly stated what has been said of Lord Verulam.

Mr. President, I was struck particularly with one or two of the observations of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], and in attempting to secure an answer to a question from him I undertook to repeat, as a preliminary, the statements which he had made and which he at the time did not remember. I had a transcript of those statements made and presented it here to the Senator yesterday afternoon, and he agreed, I believe, that he had made the statement:

> Mr. McCUMBER. What you wanted to do—

Speaking to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]—

> What you wanted to do was to slap Japan in the face. What you wanted to do was to create such a feeling between Japan and the United States that it would be almost impossible for Japan to comply with the treaty.

Following after an interruption:

> That is not washing our hands clean of that subject by any means.

This was in answer to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON].

> It is getting into it in such a way that we will have to wash our hands with blood unless Japan backs down, and you are putting her in a position where she can scarcely honorably back down. You are insulting her and her people by a declaration that she can not be trusted.

Following that the Senator again, as he had theretofore done, repeatedly made the statement that Senators by their action in inserting the word "China" in lieu of the word "Japan" intended that their purpose was to kill the treaty.

So far as I am concerned—and I am, with the Senator from North Dakota, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee—I have given him entire credit for sincerity in the position which he has taken and in the votes which he has cast upon any paragraph of the treaty. I have given him credit for the utmost sincerity in the speeches which he has made upon several occasions in the Senate touching the matter. All that I have asked, as one of the Senators who are not of his line of thought with reference to this treaty, is at least the same degree of patience with myself which I have always been ready to extend to him or to others who are in favor of the treaty as it stands. That degree of credit has not been given. When I hear myself and other Senators who think as I do constantly abused, constantly criticized for our course with reference to this matter, by Senators who proclaim their own good faith, their own sincerity, their own patriotism, I must necessarily finally begin to believe that those Senators have not the sincerity of purpose for which I have given them credit. I have found, in my somewhat varied experience in life, that the man who is always ready to distrust the motives of another, or to reflect upon the motives of the other, or to criticize the motives actuating the words or the acts of the other, is one who often feels that his own position is not entirely secure and who may be actuated by other motives than those which he expresses. This is the natural conclusion which we must arrive at if we entertain the feeling that our colleagues in this body are sincere upon the questions which they discuss or upon which they vote.

I for one am wearied with this constant course of criticism; and I say that when the Senator from North Dakota or any other Senator in this body makes the statement, here or elsewhere, that in my action here in asking advice of those who are presumed to know, in seeking information from every source that I think it is obtainable, in casting my vote to right a wrong, as I considered it, in inserting the word "China" for "Japan"—when he says that I do that with any other motive than that which is apparent in the casting of the vote itself for the purpose for which the vote is cast, he is stating what is not true. The same is true of the other amendments upon which I have voted and upon which I have insisted. I have done so, I have voted or made my insistence as strenuously as possible, because of a sincere belief, a sincere conviction, that we are now confronted with the greatest crisis which we have ever been compelled to face, at least since the early days of the Civil War, and in many respects, in my judgment, with due deference to the judgment of others, with a very much more serious crisis.

Mr. President, I have always been convinced of the sincerity of those Senators in this body who at or prior to the outbreak of the Rebellion insisted upon the rights of the States to secede. I have given credit for equal sincerity and very much better judgment and more patriotism to those in the Senate at that time who insisted upon maintaining the Union in all its power and its glory. I know that at that time it was not a political question.

The right of secession was not entirely a sectional question. There were Members of the Senate at that time who believed in the right of the several States to secede from this Union and to destroy this Union by secession. I know that one great Senator from the State of Oregon—the State of North Dakota was not in existence at that time, but it is a near neighbor—entertained and expressed those views. I refer to Senator Lane, of Oregon. I know that various other Senators from the North and from the Northwest maintained that the South should have the right to secede from this Union and destroy it if they so desired; that they should not be coerced with arms.

I say to you, Senators, that to-day the same spirit which would then have disunited this Union is abroad in this country. In my judgment the joining of the United States with the nations of Europe and of the world with whom she has nothing in common, the entrance of this country into all the broils and the quarrels and the disturbances and partaking in the selfish interests and disputes of Europe, would just so surely destroy this great Government of ours, which was maintained by the loyal people from 1860 to 1865, as would the efforts of those who believed to the contrary had they been successful in 1860. I believe that those Senators who are standing here now urging that this Union be perpetuated as our fathers built it and as Lincoln saved it are performing as sincere and patriotic a duty as those who took their muskets in hand and saved the Union in the bloody days of the Civil War. Men then, in the North or other sections of the country, assisting by their votes or by their voices in the attempted destruction of the Union were known as "copperheads"; but there was no political issue until finally, in 1863, the Democratic Party met in convention and by resolution solemnly declared that the war was a failure, and the Republican Party met in convention and proclaimed their allegiance to the Union of their fathers and their purpose to fight until the last drop of blood was spilled and the last dollar was expended from the Treasury to perpetuate this Union which the opposite party declared already a failure.

If this is to be made a political issue, let it come. I for one have no fear of the result. Why the insistence upon immediate action by this country without knowing what is contained in this treaty, without the Senators themselves knowing? Why the insistence? Because those who take it as it comes from the White House typewriter, those who would force us to accept it as the Germans were forced to accept it, at the point of the bayonet, with no more consideration shown to the American people who oppose it than the German people who signed it under protest—those who are in that frame of mind know that by the discussion going on here the people are being informed, and they, as they have for seven years past, fear informed public opinion in the United States.

I demand for myself the same consideration which I extend to other Senators here. I may be in error. My judgment is entirely fallible. If I err, I err sincerely. If I err, I err through an excess of patriotism. I err because I am an American citizen and because I can see no other body in the political firmament than the United States of America and her welfare. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). The occupants of the galleries must preserve order. No applause is permitted under the rules.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, in passing I shall now simply refer for a moment to the Shantung controversy.

It is admitted by the Senator from North Dakota and every other Senator who has attempted to speak—and somehow only he has taken upon his shoulders the advocacy of the cause of Japan; the President has not done it; none of the other Senators have, understandingly, I think, attempted to defend the cause of Japan; yet, in defending the Shantung article in the treaty, none have undertaken to deny that Germany obtained her title to Shantung by force and duress.

As yet I have heard none defend the course of Germany in acquiring the Shantung possessions, and yet the Senator from North Dakota and others use two arguments: First, that Japan obtains the stolen goods which Germany stole, and that we should perpetuate the outrage and the fraud; second, that if she does not claim under Germany's title, then she claims by conquest the possessions of her and our ally.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, does the Senator give that as my statement?

Mr. FALL. I give that as the Senator's statement; possibly not in words, because he attempted to cover it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I deny that statement in toto as being absolutely and unquestionably false.

Mr. FALL. I am not surprised.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; the Senator need not be surprised. I have never taken any such stand. I not only think the action of Japan was wrong, but I stated wherein I thought and believe that it can be righted.

Mr. FALL. Yes; I understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has asked that both sides be treated with fairness. Then I ask him to treat my remarks as meaning just exactly what they do mean, and with the same fairness. I am not afraid but that I can justify myself in the positions I shall take, but I do not want the Senator either to misquote my position or to misstate a thing I have said.

Mr. FALL. I have undertaken to state the conclusions inevitably to be derived from the Senator's statements upon the floor and elsewhere.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is no conclusion the Senator can justly derive from any statement I have made that I say that the action of either Germany or Japan was fair or moral in any respect; and, in fact, the Senator knows, if he remained during the discussion, that I declared them to be unjust and unfair.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, as I said in opening, we are all under a strain, and there are certain microbes apparently in the atmosphere. The Senator has just drawn the conclusion from my remarks that I said or concluded that he was justifying the acquisition of the Shantung Peninsula by Germany. I stated exactly the contrary—that he did not dare to undertake to defend it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; and then the Senator stated that I defend the claim of Japan. I do not.

Mr. FALL. The Senator defended the Shantung provision in this treaty, and he claimed that Japan had a right to take Shantung because she derived her title either from Germany's wrongful possession or from Japan's conquest of Germany's wrongful possession, thus taking possession of the territory of our and her ally.

Mr. McCUMBER. And she derived it under a solemn obligation that she would return it; and that the Senator fails to mention.

Mr. FALL. Oh, I am not——

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. FALL. I will.

Mr. McCUMBER. While the Senator is, as a doctor, prescribing something for the other Senators to take for their overnervous condition, I think the Senator ought to take a little of his own medicine for that purpose, for certainly, I think, the Senator forgets himself when he accuses one of the oldest and one of the strongest men in the Senate of having reached a condition of childhood. I do not think that he is acting upon his best judgment or that he is entirely free from what he is imputing to other Senators.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I decline to take any further emetics in this course of medicine.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator will probably get some of his own medicine after a while.

Mr. FALL. I am tired of that. The Senator can administer medicine in any way he desires.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I take it, the Senator can be sure that he will take his part of it.

Mr. FALL. We will see about that.

Mr. McCUMBER. We will see about it; that is dead certain. There is no question about that.

Mr. FALL. From the Senator's speech of yesterday to his action of to-day is from the sublime to the ridiculous.

Mr. President, the people of the United States are being told, and have recently been told by the President of the United States, that we could not reduce the high cost of living until we had agreed to this peace treaty. The people have been told that the high cost of living could only temporarily be dealt with until we have agreed to the treaty now pending.

A few days since, in a conference at the White House, I left with the President of the United States some questions in writing concerning the treaty, directly or indirectly, as affecting those conditions to which he had referred in his address to the joint session of Congress. The President requested or suggested that he might reply to the questions in writing. In due course I received the reply of the President to the questions, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] was kind enough to have the questions and replies printed in the RECORD two or three days since. I stated that I had intended to do so, and despite the fact that he was kind enough to anticipate me, I shall refer to the questions and the President's answers with a few comments upon the subject. It may possibly be a strain upon the patience of some of my impatient colleagues. Nevertheless, I feel that I shall have performed a duty to the people of the United States when I explain to them by the official documents what the condition of the United States is now with reference to peace or war. It is particularly appropriate that this should be done this morning, because the news press is full of the statement of yesterday afternoon, reiterated to-day, that at least two regiments of American soldiers are being ordered now from American soil to the plebiscite district in north Silesia. We have not enough troops upon the Continent now, not enough boys in sufficient number taken from their homes here to garrison certain districts in Siberia and to garrison the Rhine and other districts in Europe, not enough marines and sailors preserving the peace and safety and security of some unknown quantity in the great old Hanse town, the free city of Danzig; but now we must come back, without authority of the Congress of the United States, and take soldiers from our country and send others again to the disputed district or the riotous district in north Silesia, where we have not been responsible for the riot or dispute or bloodshed. It is therefore, I think, appropriate and should be interesting to the people of the United States to know what the condition of the United States is now, what the status is now as established in the United States as between this country and the country with which we have been at war.

The first question which I asked of the President was this:

In your judgment, have you not the power and authority, by a proclamation, to declare in appropriate words that peace exists and thus restore the status of peace between the governments and peoples of this country and those with whom we declared war?

The second question was as follows:

Could not, in any event, the power which declared war—that is, Congress—joined by the President, as you affixed your approval of the declaration of war, by a resolution or act of Congress declare peace, as Germany did not declare war upon us?

Two other questions I asked, which I shall later read, upon the same subject, and to the first four questions the President replied giving one answer. As will be seen from a reading of the answers and later a reading of the other questions, the answer was not applicable to the last three questions as legal propositions, but only as expressing the determination or the judgment of the President of the United States. His answer to the first four questions, given to the first one, was as follows:

I feel constrained to say in reply to your first question not only that in my judgment I have not the power by proclamation to declare that peace exists but that I could in no circumstances consent to take such a course prior to the ratification of a formal treaty of peace.

I feel it due to perfect frankness to say that it would, in my opinion, put a stain upon our national honor which we never could efface if after sending our men to the battle field to fight the common cause we should abandon our associates in the war in the settlement of the terms of peace and disassociate ourselves from all responsibility with regard to those terms.

Now, Mr. President, judging from the record, from what the President has said and written and from the record of the proceedings of the peace conference and the record which he and others have made since that time, I have been compelled to form the judgment that the President of the United States in entering upon the peace conference was so obsessed with the idea of obtaining something in the nature of a "shell" at least of a league of nations that he could not give his attention to the details of the treaty which he brought back and presented to us, nor was he particularly concerned with the details of the league covenant itself. He and his Secretary of State construe some of the league covenants differently. They certainly construe the provisions of the peace treaty differently. I may call attention to the fact that only in the preamble to the peace treaty and in article 440, the last article of the peace treaty itself, is there any reference to peace or the state of peace or how peace is to be brought about.

The great mass of the treaty is taken up with the details as to how people in northern Silesia are to be governed for an indeterminate number of years, as to how the boundary lines of certain districts being readjusted shall be readjusted, and by whom. Line after line is taken up and page after page given entirely to an attempted settlement based upon some evanescent theory of racial origin or geographical boundaries of the peoples of Europe. We are all in receipt constantly of protests, I presume, from various of these peoples, begging the Senate of the United States to seriously consider the articles with reference to themselves and protesting against what has so far been done. We do not know yet what is being done in detail with reference to Thrace and with reference to Hungary and Roumania and Czecho-Slovakia and the Serbian-Croatian States and the partition of Turkey, and yet, while the operation of partitioning and distributing is going on we are by this treaty pledging the people of the United States by at least a moral obligation to see that what is being done is maintained hereafter by this treaty itself. We do not know what is being done, and we call witness after witness before us, we seek information from the President of the United States, from the Secretary of State, and from every other source, and we get none. Then if the committee seeks to hear the protests from Norway with reference to the disposition of the Aland Islands, in which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is so materially interested that he has requested a hearing before the committee, he or other Senators rise in their seats and criticize the committee for attempting to get the information, without which I can say to you, sir, we can not intelligently deal with the treaty before us.

Now, to go back. The President having but one idea in mind—that is, the formation of some character of a so-called league of nations—has overlooked, to my mind, the material portions of the peace treaty, or what should have been the material portions of the peace treaty as relating to the United States of America, which was at war, what should become of us?

In the first place, the President seems to have lost sight of the fact that peace is a status, as war is a status, the difference being, as Oppenheim says, that "the normal condition between two States being peace, war can never be more than a temporary condition. Whatever may have been the cause or causes of war, the latter can not really last forever."

Oppenheim and Vattel, and all the other law writers of whom I have any knowledge, down to Wilson and Tucker and others of modern and contemporary times, agree that peace being a status that status can be fixed or brought about in at least three different ways:

First, through debellatio, conquest under the old Roman law, still recognized as one of the methods of bringing about peace.

Second, cessation of hostilities, the adoption of an armistice, or merely the ceasing of armed hostilities, "gliding" into a peace. It may be a peace for years. We have no such thing, the world, of course, has never known such a thing, and no nation has ever known such a thing or condition as perpetual peace.

Peace by treaty is the last peace and the most satisfactorily generally if in the peace treaty the terms of peace themselves are laid down. That is wherein, in my judgment, the treaty which we have before us absolutely fails. There is nothing in it with reference to the conditions of peace as they shall exist between this country and Germany after the Senate may have ratified this particular treaty.

Under the contention of the President of the United States, under the testimony given by the Secretary of State and others, it would be necessary for us to enter into conventions or treaties of peace to establish the rules and conditions under which this Government could operate with reference to Germany, and those aside from this so-called peace treaty.

I simply call attention to two or three occasions upon which nations have been at war for years, have made peace, have conducted the affairs of peace between themselves, without any treaty of peace whatsoever. Sweden and Poland, two of the nations with which we are now dealing, in 1716 had fought for years and then made peace by ceasing hostilities, and never made a treaty of peace.

France and Spain in 1720 had been at war for a number of years; as I recall it, seven years. They made peace by ceasing hostilities, and never made or entered into a treaty of peace for the conclusion of that war, at least.

Spain and her American colonies were at war for many years. The colonies finally achieved their independence from Spain, but it was not acknowledged by Spain, and Spain never entered into a treaty even of recognition of the independence of those colonies until 15 to 20 years or more had elapsed and it became necessary for her to enter into consular agreements with them for the interchange of commercial intercourse. Chile was not recognized by Spain until the year 1840. Spain was again at war with Chile and with Peru in 1866, and the war drifted along and finally ceased. We, the United States of America, undertook to do business with Peru and with Chile, and Spain on one occasion, and Peru, or some one in Peru or Chile, entered protest that they were still at war and that we should regard the rules of belligerency. The United States of America said: "We will settle that for ourselves. You have been at peace, and simply because you have not signed a treaty of peace or entered into peace negotiations you can not bind the world. You are at peace. We will settle that for ourselves." And we did.

Mr. KING. Will it disturb the Senator if I interrupt him?

Mr. FALL. Not at all. I shall be very glad to have the Senator interrupt me.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator is correct in the illustration which he has given. There have been a number of occasions in which the belligerents have accepted a status of peace without an affirmative declaration. But does not the Senator think that it proceeds very much upon the same theory that men may sometimes make a contract by negative action, if I may use that expression, rather than by affirmative action? That is to say, nations who have been at war, as in the instances which the Senator has given, have proceeded upon the assumption that there was a status of peace and the war had terminated, and they have acquiesced in the status of peace. Does not the Senator think that that conduct by the resumption of diplomatic relations, and so on, would take the place of an affirmative declaration of peace which we denominate a treaty?

Mr. FALL. I do not think the resumption of diplomatic relations in such a case is necessary, because we have decided that. France had a war with Mexico in 1867. She never declared peace and she did not resume diplomatic relations with Mexico until 1884, and yet she was at peace and did business with Mexico. In doing business with a country, your business man deals through consuls and consular agents, who are not diplomatic agents. With that difference I agree with the Senator that the fact has to be established as to whether peace or war exists by the action of the nations themselves with reference to the citizens or nationals of the nations in doing business together.

A resumption of what the Senator possibly had in mind—that is, an exchange of ministers or ambassadors—is not necessary, while it is necessary to have either your own consuls or some other consuls represent your business men in the foreign country for the purpose of visēing passports and bills of lading, making proofs, and so forth.

Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that before I conclude my remarks I shall show that the people of the United States by the act and declaration of the President of the United States are on absolute peace terms with the people of Germany and with the Government of Germany. I shall not at this time go into any argument along the details of this question further than to call attention to the end of our Civil War. It is true that that was a civil war, but it was a war in which the belligerency of the Confederacy was admitted by many foreign countries—for instance, Great Britain. It was a war, and certainly a "regular" war, Mr. President, in view of the fact that in proportion to the numbers engaged there were more killed in the battles of the Wilderness than were killed in any equal number of days or in any battle occurring in France or on the bloody fields of Europe during this recent war, which we proclaim as the bloodiest in the history of the world.

I shall pass as rapidly as possible in the discussion of this question to the thought which I stated to the Senator as that which I should offer; but, first, I refer to the Civil War, which was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States to be closed by the proclamation of the President of the United States—with reference, at least, to a large number of the States in the South engaged in it—which was issued in April, 1866. The terms of surrender and the peace terms in so far as Gen. Lee could bind the Southern Confederacy were arranged between Lee and Grant at the surrender of Appomattox, just as the armistice was arranged between Gen. Foch and the opposing German generals in November of last year.

The peace terms at the conclusion of the Civil War were followed immediately by the proclamation of the President of the United States, and the Supreme Court declared that that proclamation established peace.

Mr. President, I have not in my desk the proclamation of the President of the United States issued on April 6, 1917, declaring a state of war to exist between this country and Germany. I have that proclamation in my office, and, should it be necessary, I will send for it before I conclude my remarks on this occasion. I had, however, intended to read it into the RECORD. Following the action of the Congress of the United States, at the request of the President of the United States, declaring that we recognized the condition of war as thrust upon us by the acts of Germany, the President, as became his duty, immediately issued a proclamation to the people of the United States that war between Germany and the United States existed. In that proclamation, of course, he cited the resolution of the Congress of the United States. Then he proceeded to warn the people of the United States as to their connection with the enemy or the allies of the enemy, and he proceeded to recite the statute of the United States with reference to the action of enemies in this country; he covered the entire field. The state of war existed from the time, of course, of the declaration of war by Congress, but the warning issued to the people both of the enemy country and their allies and to our people that such a declaration had been made, and as to what laws would be in force, was properly made by the President of the United States immediately following, and upon his own initiative. It was not required to be done by law.

Now, there are three methods or more, Mr. President, of carrying on a war against an enemy country aside from that method which was used in this war, of armed hostilities. One of those methods is by closing our ports to shipments of the enemy country by refusing to allow a cargo destined for an enemy port or ships destined for enemy ports clearing from our harbors under our harbor laws and navigation laws. Of course, action in those matters is peculiarly an Executive function and is in the hands of the President of the United States. The port collectors and others have been since the proclamation of the President acting under it until a recent date.

The next and most efficient and effective method of waging war was ascertained in 1798 to be by the passing of an act imposing a very severe penalty upon citizens of this country who undertook to trade with enemy citizens or their allies either in this country or beyond its boundaries. During this present war, in October, 1917, following the declaration of war in April, it became apparent to the Congress of the United States that the old trading-with-the-enemy statute, practically obsolete, having been on the books for a hundred years or more, needed revising, and that other subjects should be dealt with specifically in any such revision. Therefore the Congress of the United States passed what was known as the trading-with-the-enemy act, that being the efficient method of carrying on war against Germany in this country, and it being the method through which any citizen of this country dealing with the citizens of the enemy country or their allies laid themselves liable to very heavy and severe penalties. That act immediately stopped trading with the enemy or the allies of the enemy.

This was followed by the President issuing what were known as blacklists prohibiting trading by the citizens of this country with firms in Germany and firms in neutral countries which were supposed to be directly or indirectly aiding the enemy with whom we were at war. Those blacklists continued up until recent days; they have been revised upon various occasions, added to or subtracted from, during the war. The trading-with-the-enemy act was supposed to be in full force and effect until a comparatively recent date.

The prohibiting of the clearance from our coasts of cargoes destined for the assistance of the enemy, either sailing directly to their ports or through neutral ports; the prevention of the landing of enemy cargoes upon our soil or in our harbors; and the trading-with-the-enemy act, penalizing any act in violation of the proclamation of the President of the United States following the declaration of war by Congress, were the effective means of winning this war, aside from the sacrifice made by our heroic soldiers upon the fields of France.

No one, of course, for a moment would detract from what was done by our soldiers in bringing peace to a distracted world, in at least achieving the objects for which this country went to war. No one, upon the other hand, should forget for a moment the sacrifices made by the people of the United States in submitting to the harsh terms of censorship and to the trading-with-the-enemy act; in submitting to having their houses invaded without due process of law; in submitting to arrest upon the streets without legal warrants for arrest; in submitting to having a portion of their food taken from their tables that it might be furnished to the starving people of Europe, to support our own armies, and to support the civilian populations of those countries who had been outraged and were famished and starving. The world should never forget what the people of the United States of America did voluntarily and because of the acts of Congress under which the President could prohibit such acts as dealing with the enemy either through our ports or here upon our soil or in other portions of the world.

The administration of the trading-with-the-enemy act, Mr. President, was entirely in the President's hands; everything was left to him; he was to put it in force through his departments; he was to see that its terms were complied with or that any infraction of it was punished.

I have before me here the trading-with-the-enemy act, and I desire to read a portion of section 4 of that act, which was approved October 6, 1917—

Every enemy or ally of enemy—

I will pass over section 4 for the time being and will read first from section 5:

That the President, if he shall find it compatible with the safety of the United States and with the successful prosecution of the war, may, by proclamation, suspend the provisions of this act as they apply to an ally of enemy—

I have not heard of any such proclamation being issued by the President of the United States. He is only authorized by such proclamation—to suspend the provisions of this act so far as they apply to an ally of enemy—

Not to the enemy itself—and he may revoke or renew such suspensions from time to time; and the President may grant licenses—

I invite the attention of Senators to the words—may grant licenses, special or general, temporary or otherwise, and for such period of time and containing such provisions and conditions as he shall prescribe, to any person or class of persons to do business as provided in subsection (a) of section 4 hereof.

Mr. President, subsection (a) of section 4 I had commenced to read, but unless some Senator desires to have it read I shall not do so, because it refers to insurance or reinsurance. Therefore this provision as to granting licenses applies to insurance or reinsurance—and to perform any act made unlawful without such license in section 3 hereof, and to file and prosecute applications under subsection (b) of section 10 hereof; and he may revoke or renew such licenses from time to time.

There is also a provision that he might issue licenses, waiving the provisions of section 3, the licenses to be issued upon application and to be general or special. The general or special licenses provided for in reading the context can readily be understood. They are special for certain classes of business. A business man engaged in general business may secure a special license for a special product which he desires to import or to export, and, if he is engaged in the exporting and importing business, he may secure, upon proper application, a general license for such business.

Section 3, subsection (a), makes it unlawful—

For any person in the United States, except with the license of the President, granted to such person, or to the enemy, or ally of enemy, as provided in this act, to trade, or attempt to trade, either directly or indirectly, with, to, or from, or for, or on account of, or on behalf of, or for the benefit of, any other person, with knowledge or reasonable cause to believe that such other person is an enemy or ally of enemy, or is conducting or taking part in such trade, directly or indirectly, for, or on account of, or on behalf of, or for the benefit of, an enemy or ally of enemy.

Subsection (b) of section 3 makes it unlawful—

For any person, except with the license of the President, to transport or attempt to transport into or from the United States, or for any owner, master, or other person in charge of a vessel of American registry to transport or attempt to transport from any place to any other place, any subject or citizen of an enemy or ally of enemy nation, with knowledge or reasonable cause to believe that the person transported or attempted to be transported is such subject or citizen.

The right of the President to waive the penalties of this act in favor of the citizen is specifically laid down. That right extends, however, to his power, in his discretion, upon application, to issue a special or a general license.

I shall pass hurriedly to a consideration of what has been the course of the Government upon that subject. I called attention, Mr. President, a few days ago, to certain circulars issued by the department, and particularly to a circular of July 14, 1919. I now read from the copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in which I had inserted that circular. I read the first paragraph:

The War Trade Board section of the Department of State announces that a general enemy-trade license—

Note the words, "a general enemy-trade license"— has been issued authorizing all persons in the United States on and after July 14, 1919, to trade and communicate with persons residing in Germany and to trade and communicate with all persons with whom trade and communication is prohibited by the trading-with-the-enemy act.

There are certain specific restrictions with reference to the importation of dyestuffs and similar articles. I shall read no further from this circular, the greater portion of it being already in the RECORD.

Mr. President, I called attention during the remarks which I made upon that occasion to the fact that during the month of June prior to the issuing of this proclamation this country had transacted with Germany $8,783,000 worth of business, while in the same length of time it had transacted with Spain, a country with which we have been at peace since 1898, $8,685,000 worth of business; in other words, our nationals transacted with Germany $100,000 more business in the month of June, prior to the issue of this so-called general license, than they did with the friendly country of Spain, to which we have always been an exporter. I called attention, further, to the fact that during the same time we transacted approximately twice as much business with Germany as we transacted with all the Central American countries.

Mr. President, I find that the following circular was issued some time since——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the Senator passes from that, the Senator made reference the other day when he was going over this same subject matter to certain shipments of cotton to Germany. I think the value of that cotton was included as a part of the aggregate to which he refers.

Mr. FALL. No; the Senator is in error about that. The cotton was shipped after the data were obtained from the Government reports. I simply called attention to that fact to show that cotton is now being shipped outright directly to Hamburg, Germany, a German port.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. Now, Mr. President, I want to make a correction of a statement made at that time by the Senator. I thought that was rather curious, because I understood that most of the cotton that had gone to Germany had gone through the neutral port of Rotterdam, and not directly. There was a shipment of cotton to Hamburg, as the Senator said, but it was not for the Germans nor for German nationals, and I quote this from the Associated Press, coming from a New Orleans paper. I do not think this discussion is at all relevant to the general issue, but I just want the historical facts right.

Mr. FALL. I have no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS (reading):

The assertion of Senator FALL, Republican, New Mexico, during debate on the peace in the Senate yesterday that a cargo of cotton was forwarded from New Orleans to Hamburg June 28 for use in Germany, was denied by steamship officials here to-day.

The steamship Waukegan, of the Kerr Steamship Line, sailed from New Orleans on June 29 with a cargo of 22,000 bales of cotton for the American Relief Association in Hamburg for distribution to the Czecho-Slovak nation, officials of the line stated. So far as records here show there was no cotton shipped from this port for use in that country—

That means Germany—

during June or July.

So that all shipments that took place were taking place subsequently to this general license.

Mr. FALL. Yes. Mr. President, I thank the Senator very much, because he has now fixed in the RECORD the fact that not only have our nationals been doing business with German nationals, but that the Government of the United States has been directly doing business through German ports in shipping supplies to Czechoslovakia; and, of course, I am grateful to the Senator for the interjection.

Mr. President, I find under serial No. 84, effective July 17, 1918, "United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, rates of freight from United States Atlantic and Gulf ports to Europe on cotton," the following: Germany (Bremen, Hamburg), high density per 100 pounds, from Atlantic ports, rate $1.75; standard, $2; from Gulf ports, $2 and $2.25, respectively. I find, effective under date July 21, from the same authority, "Rates are on all cargo except as mentioned below," and the exception is the special rate upon cotton, and certain other special rates: Hamburg, Bremen, per 100 pounds, $1.50; per cubic foot, 70 cents. I find under the same date, "Rates are on all cargo except as mentioned below," making certain other exceptions upon which specific rates are fixed, the general rate for Bremen and Hamburg being $1.57½ and 75 cents.

I find the same rates—this is all under the authority of the United States Shipping Board, and is, of course, for the Government vessels—Germany (Bremen, Hamburg), regular rates, the same as all neutral countries.

Mr. President, the significance of these matters will possibly appear, even to the minds of some of those who close their mind to the ear, a little later.

What do the records which I have referred to establish? First, this—and I will ask any of the lawyers in the Senate to assist me in construing them: That an attempt has been made, by the use of the licensing power in the trading-with-the-enemy act, to extend to all people alike in the United States, under a proclamation, the right to do business with Germany. Second, the fact that no such authority is granted in the trading-with-the-enemy act itself. This matter, however, has undoubtedly been passed upon by the advisers of the State Department, and they have undoubtedly come to a different conclusion. In reading the act I can not see how it is possible to place upon it the construction that the President of the United States, by proclamation, can suspend the act generally. He can, upon application, grant special or general licenses to individuals; but the issuance of a general proclamation that all the people of the United States can do business with Germany, thus restoring peace by a subterfuge, is something which I do not think can be legally done.

There is, however, a method provided in the act itself by which the President can legally do what he has done. I find no complaint with the act itself. I have been insistent for two months that a status of peace should be declared between this country and Germany because it actually existed, and that trade relations should be restored between this country and Germany because the reason for prohibiting them no longer prevails. I offered a resolution in the Senate to that effect. I frankly say that I could not get enough votes to pass it, or I would have pressed it to a vote long since, because I thought that by some legal method of procedure there should be done in the interests of the people of the United States exactly what has been done by an evasion of the law, in my judgment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FALL. I yield, because I had hoped the Senator would undertake to elucidate for me the legal problem involved.

Mr. KING. Oh, Mr. President, of course I would not pretend to elucidate a subject that the Senator from New Mexico touches, because whatever he speaks about he does illumine, and perhaps the question I was about to propound is not germane to the matter which he was just discussing.

As I follow the Senator, however, his contention is this: Because there is a suspension of the trading-with-the-enemy act, or a modification, or a repeal—and for the purpose of my question I am willing to concede that it goes to the full limit, and that there is a repeal, so far as the President and the officials of the Government without an act of Congress may repeal it—that because there is a repeal of the trading-with-the-enemy act, and commercial relations to a greater or less extent exist between this Government and Germany, therefore it must follow that the status of peace exists.

If that is the position of the Senator, I shall be very glad to have him elucidate the subject a little further, because I can not assent to that proposition, if the Senator goes that far. I can understand that a condition of war, at least theoretically, may exist between belligerents, and that for humanitarian or other reasons one of the belligerents may be willing that food or other supplies may be shipped to the defeated and conquered belligerent pending the final determination of all of the questions at issue, which are being determined in a peace treaty; and I do not see, under conditions of that character, how it would be successfully contented, as a legal proposition, that there was a status of peace, and that there was no further necessity of negotiation in order to bring about a complete status of peace.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the Senator has hit the keynote of the whole situation. There is necessity for further negotiation. The treaty that we are considering has gone past the period of negotiation, and does not provide the terms of peace between Germany and the United States. It simply provides for certain rules and regulations governing foreign countries and foreign districts, and does not refer to the people of the United States, nor restore trade conditions, nor restore a condition of peace between this country and Germany, except as there is a provision in the first paragraph, construed with the last article, that upon the ratification by three nations of this peace treaty with Germany, and the filing of the procès-verbal in Paris, by that act the war shall terminate. Only so far does it affect the people of the United States at all, and they do not understand it; and those who are impatient with us who attempt to explain it to them are impatient because they do not want the people of the United States to understand it.

I refer more paricularly now to the answer the Senator has requested me to give as to my understanding of these acts restoring the status of peace.

The Congress of the United States declared the status of war under its constitutional power. The President, in my judgment, had nothing whatsoever to do with it by approval or disapproval of the resolution. However, that is an academic proposition. He did approve it. The Congress of the United States, under our Constitution, is the only power which can create the status of war for the people of the United States, and they lay down the rules and regulations under which that war is to be prosecuted in so far as they themselves are concerned, giving to the President of the United States the management of their armed forces, and giving to him the execution of the laws which they pass for themselves.

They gave him the most ample power, through these laws, for governing themselves and regulating their intercourse with the enemy during the period of the war, and he has repealed them by implication. He has repealed them by an attempt to issue a general license, as he calls it, authorizing any man, woman, or child in the United States to do business with Germany or any ally of Germany, in Germany or elsewhere.

There is one method, and one method alone, and it is provided in the law itself, by which the President of the United States can suspend the trading-with-the-enemy act. I quarrel not with his acts, but I quarrel with his disingenuous answer to my question when he said that he could not by a proclamation create the status of peace in so far as our people were concerned. The Senator has well in mind the point which I have been discussing. The President of the United States has gone abroad through the land, through his address to the Congress of the United States, and has asserted that one of the causes of the high cost of living was the fact that we were not on peace terms, not doing business with the other nations of the world, and that permanent relief could be brought about only by the ratification of his treaty pending before us; and he himself has restored the status of peace and provided rules and regulations for doing business which are not provided in the treaty which he drew after seven months' arduous labors; but he has answered outright to the first question that he has not the power. The whole purport of my questions, as shown by reading them, is as he understood them, and refers to his argument as to the high cost of living; and he has argued himself out of court, and there is no ingenious argument or hair-splitting definition that the Senator or anybody else can read into it that will get him back.

The President says he has no authority to proclaim a status of peace directly. That is the one direct answer which he makes to the four questions; and yet in the trading-with-the-enemy act itself, which he has avoided, which he has, in fact, suspended by a violation of its provisions, I find the following provision:

> The words "end of the war," as used herein, shall be deemed to mean the date of proclamation of exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace, unless the President shall, by proclamation, declare a prior date, in which case the date so proclaimed shall be deemed to be the "end of the war" within the meaning of this act.

Yet he says that he has no power to do what, as a matter of fact, he has done by the issuance through the State Department of the proclamation of July 14, extending or attempting to extend a general license to do business.

Mr. President, I am taking up much more time than I expected to occupy. I will read one more circular.

The Department of State has charge of all of our relations with reference to the trading-with-the-enemy act under the act of Congress itself, which allows the President to authorize the Department of State to do things for him with relation to it.

On August 15 the Department of State issued the following circular relating to general import licenses intended to cover tin and certain drugs and chemicals. Now, listen:

> The War Trade Board Section of the Department of State announces that general import license PBF 3 (W. T. B. R. 822, issued Aug. 7, 1919) has been revised and extended, effective August 15, 1919, so as to permit the free importation thereunder, without individual import licenses—

Any man can bring his stuff in here now without any individual import license at all, from Germany or from elsewhere, and trade freely with this country, except as certain chemicals and other articles are exempted from such general import license or provision; and in the exemption the only requirement is that they must have the particular individual import licenses for such articles. As to all other articles, they need no individual import licenses.

> As now amended, general import license PBF No. 3 authorizes the importation into the United States from all countries of the world, except Hungary and those parts of Russia under the control of the Bolshevik authorities, of all commodities except those hereinafter specifically enumerated, to wit:
> 1. The following foodstuffs.

And as to those, a particular import license is necessary.

Mr. President, can anyone in authority, can any official in the United States of America, or any body of Congress or any number of Senators, through order or asseveration—that is all we hear—any longer befool the people of the United States and make them believe that they are not on a status of actual peace with Germany and with all the other countries of Europe, except Hungary and the Bolshevik portions of Russia, under this last circular? Can anyone longer proclaim to the people of the United States that before they can have relief in their own country from the high cost of living we must ratify this treaty without crossing a "t" or dotting an "i," when by Executive order itself, whether taken in pursuance of Executive authority duly vested or not, the status of peace has been actually extended over the United States? Can the fact that without constitutional authority or authority of the Congress of the United States the President may, as Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States, seize or take two regiments of soldiers now in camp here and send them to the riotous neighborhood of upper Silesia, on the line of Poland and Prussia—can the fact that he still usurps that authority change the condition existing? And if he still has that authority without usurpation, how can it affect the high cost of living in the United States of America? Let some one answer who understands better or has inside source of information which the Committee on Foreign Relations have been seeking most assiduously for the last two months. Let some one answer.

Mr. President, in connection with this same subject I have sought information from every witness who has come before us, and finally from the President of the United States himself I discovered the status with relation to our business connections with Germany and how our citizens could do business in Germany, in German ports and in German territory, under the provisions of these licenses as they would have done under ordinary peace conditions.

I asked the Secretary of State as to our consular relations with Germany, and he said, first, that they had been broken off; he said, second, that they had only been broken off because of the denunciation of that portion of the consular treaty relating to the seamen's act following the passage of what is known as the La Follette Act, and that the balance of the treaty remained in force. The President of the United States, better informed, answered:

> Question 9. Have you requested consular representatives of other countries to act for us in Germany?
> Answer 9. In February, 1917, Spain was requested to take charge of American interests in Germany through her diplomatic and consular representatives, and no other arrangement has since been made.

The fact of it is, exactly as intimated in the President's answer, that the consuls and consular agents of Spain are acting just as they acted before the war, immediately after the dismissal by the President of von Bernstorff. They are acting as consuls and consular agents of the United States, and apparently just as effectively as if we had restored all our consuls who came out at the time our ambassador to Germany asked for his exequatur.

So we have every evidence of absolute peace and trading and amity and good friendship between the two countries, except that the President of the United States, in his desire to achieve his object to fasten upon the people of the United States some supergovernment, paying no attention whatsoever to the construction of the peace treaty upon which we might do business with Germany and resume official, national, or individual relations with that country, in his anxiety to foist upon us a supergovernment because our Government apparently does not suit him, has provided that the United States should use a portion of its armed forces in the governing of upper Silesia, as he has proposed and agreed, for an indeterminate number of years; that the armed forces of the United States should continue to guard the border between Poland and Germany, just as he attempted to provide for the reparation commission governmental powers to be exercised by it for the use of American soldiers. And the people of the United States do not know it!

We have them there now under the terms of this treaty performing duties for some one else. We have commissioners there whom it is necessary to guard. It is even necessary at Mr. Hoover's request to furnish him an armed guard that he may distribute food or the cotton which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] says we are shipping for his disposition to Czechoslovakia.

How long are an outraged people to be compelled to submit to dictatorship in this country? They provide by their laws when these conditions shall cease. The laws have been enforced by a violation of them and the status of peace exists. The law provides that the President may by proclamation end it all, and he says that he can not, and yet he ends it by a misconstruction, in my judgment, of the specific authority vested by other portions of the act.

Mr. President, hurriedly passing to one or two other subjects, we are proposing to establish a league of nations. The fact has been commented upon by various other Senators that a numerical majority of the population of the earth are not in the proposed league nor have they been invited to come into the league. Russia with 180,000,000 or 200,000,000 people is out of it; China with 400,000,000 people is out of it; Turkey is out of it; Bulgaria is out of it; Hungary is out of it; Austria is out of it. But certain nations of the earth were invited by the Versailles convention and invited in this treaty which we are now passing upon to become members of the league. Among these were the great neutral Scandanavian countries, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, and then Holland and Switzerland. Switzerland is to be the seat of the council of the league, the capital of the world under the provisions of the treaty. The President of the United States is the president of the league commission formed during that conference. The President of the United States has appointed committees to arrange the details of the first meeting. The President of the United States was asked if he had heard from his appointees on the subject, and he said, "No." As the chairman of the commission upon the league one would judge that any invitation, if accepted or rejected, extended to any nation would be understood by the President of the United States, the chairman of the commission upon the league; and yet he answered that he has not heard officially from the invitations extended to Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, and Switzerland.

You may ask what significance this has. Just recall that a short time since when Germany was being compelled to sign this treaty it was held out and announced to the world and told to her that in the event she did not sign it within a given number of days a blockade would be thrown around her and that food and supplies would be kept from her starving population. Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, and Switzerland were invited by the five allied and associated powers to become parties to this blockade to starve the people of Germany into submission to the terms of the treaty. What did those countries do? They promptly refused. They would not join the allied nations and associated powers in the blockade; they would continue to maintain their neutrality.

Now, we have pending before the Senate of the United States for our consideration a treaty between Great Britain and France and the United States of America which we are asked to ratify, and which, if we so ratify, the league of nations may put in effect or not as it pleases. You are inviting Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, and Switzerland to violate their neutrality to Germany by becoming a part of the governing power which will enforce this treaty against Germany, by which we agree to go to her assistance with reference to what the league may do, provided the league first approves it. Do you suppose that those great nations who maintained their neutrality are going to enter into a league until Germany enters it and all nations stand upon an equality in that league assembled? Or do you suppose that if they may entertain the deepest sentiments of friendship for the people of this great country, Germany remaining out, Russia remaining out, Austria, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Turkey remaining out, those great independent nations of the world who have been able to maintain their independence against Russia, on the one hand, and Germany and Great Britain, on the other, are going to enter now this league of nations against Germany itself and approve a treaty prepared specifically against Germany? If they do not, where is your league? Germany with other great nations of the earth who are not invited, who are not in this league, this great group of neutral nations standing out, may join the strongest group, whether in or out of the league.

I say that by bringing the treaty here you injected into the discussion of the treaty which we now have before us an element of danger which those engaged in the negotiation of the French treaty never for one moment thought of or else to avoid which they had some ulterior design, in my opinion. What it is I can not conceive.

Yet we are asked to ratify both treaties and not to consider the one with the other. You ask to hurry the committee, to take out of the hands of the committee by a vote of the Senate the consideration of this treaty by your Committee on Foreign Relations, and you yourselves have taken what the President himself has said is one of the links in this treaty and put it in the hands of another committee of your own body, which as yet has not made a report.

I want the people of the United States to understand that despite what has been said here by these constitutional scorners the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate are patriotically, sincerely, and as honestly as they know how attempting to do the work which you have placed in their hands, and if you are not satisfied with it I challenge you to bring it upon the floor and through open debate here let the people of the United States know what is behind the treaty and what it amounts to, that it means war in every line of it. The Saar Basin provision, in so far as the United States is concerned, means war for the present and war for the future; the reparations commission with powers vested in it means war now, means American soldiers now; not at some distant date in the future, but now and for a time indeterminate. It means war in itself. The commission of government for upper Silesia or a plebiscite for upper Silesia means war, an actual state of war and future war; and your Commander in Chief is recruiting his Army with your soldiers for that border and against people with whom we have had no difficulty. You are fighting now and your children are being killed, with our marines and sailors in the old Hanse town of Danzig, one of that little group which was the mistress of the commerce of the world 500 years ago, always a great city, which joined Prussia and the German Empire by her own desire, never was conquered, and you are taking her away and you have to do it by the blood of your soldiers, and they are spilling the blood of your sailors and your marines in her streets now. The people do not know it; and yet you call upon us not to inform them through the only forum open to us, the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, I have taken up too much time. At some future occasion I shall go a little more fully into the ingenious answers of the President of the United States to the questions which were propounded to him.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask the Senate now to proceed with the oil-leasing bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. SMOOT. From the information I have, if we will continue the consideration of the bill from now on, I am quite sure that we can finish it before the close of to-day's session. A good many hours have been spent upon a question foreign to the bill under consideration, and I ask now that the pending amendment be reported.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARDING in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Hale	Lenroot	Robinson
Bankhead	Harding	Lodge	Sheppard
Borah	Harris	McCormick	Shields
Brandegee	Harrison	McCumber	Smith, Md.
Calder	Henderson	McKellar	Smith, S. C.
Capper	Johnson, S. Dak.	McNary	Smoot
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Moses	Spencer
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	New	Sterling
Curtis	Kendrick	Norris	Sutherland
Dial	Kenyon	Nugent	Thomas
Elkins	Keyes	Overman	Trammell
Fall	King	Page	Wadsworth
France	Kirby	Phelan	Walsh, Mass.
Gay	Knox	Poindexter	Walsh, Mont.
Gerry	La Follette	Ransdell	Williams

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] is necessarily detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Sixty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by Mr. KIRBY, in the nature of a substitute, is to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to mine and develop coal, oil, and gas in any lands belonging to the United States, and to operate the mines and wells under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Interior when, in his discretion, the public exigency may require that it shall be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I had intended to speak upon the proposed substitute and in my remarks to call attention to the present situation and past conditions affecting the production of oil in the United States. I think, however, that the Senate already knows full well what this amendment means, and I am perfectly willing that we shall vote upon it at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not desire that it may be said that advantage has been taken of any Senator in this matter. I know that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has a number of amendments to the bill which he desires to offer. I think, however, he has been notified that if he will now come into the Chamber, the time has arrived when he may offer his amendments. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] also has a substitute to offer for the bill. I do not desire that the bill pass from the consideration as in Committee of the Whole into the Senate until those Senators have an opportunity to offer their amendments.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. I trust the Senator will withdraw that suggestion.

Mr. KIRBY. I withdraw the suggestion, my only object in making it being to give absent Senators an opportunity to return to the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state that the Senator from Wisconsin will be here in just a moment, so it will not be necessary to call the roll to bring him into the Chamber.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, while we are awaiting the arrival of the Senator from Wisconsin, I desire to take about three minutes of the time of the Senate in replying to the argument that has just been made by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I have called for the stenographic report of some of that Senator's introductory remarks, from which I read as follows:

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, in passing I shall now simply refer for a moment to the Shantung controversy.

It is admitted by the Senator from North Dakota and every other Senator who has attempted to speak—and somehow only he has taken upon his shoulders the advocacy of the cause of Japan. The President has not done it. None of the other Senators has understandingly, I think, attempted to defend the cause of Japan; yet, in defending the Shantung article in the treaty, none has undertaken to deny that Germany obtained her title to Shantung by force and duress.

As yet I have heard none defend the course of Germany in acquiring the Shantung possessions, and yet the Senator from North Dakota and others use two arguments: First, that Japan obtains the stolen goods which Germany stole, and that we should perpetuate the outrage and the fraud; second, that if she does not claim under Germany's title, then she claims by conquest the possessions of her and our ally.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, does the Senator give that as my statement?

Mr. FALL. I give that as the Senator's statement; possibly not in words, because he attempted to cover it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I deny that statement in toto as being absolutely and unquestionably false.

I have never believed in any character of pettifogging even before the most ignorant court or justice of peace in the United States; much less do I believe in it before a body like the United States Senate. I do not believe that a Senator gains anything by misrepresenting the attitude of another Senator or misquoting what he has said. In this instance the Senator from New Mexico has both misquoted and misrepresented my position.

I have never taken the position that Germany had right to seize the Shantung Peninsula or to acquire any of the other privileges she enjoyed in China. On the other hand, I have always condemned that, and I have condemned the same course of action on the part of other countries.

In order that the RECORD may be clear and show just what my position is, I will recall my statement of yesterday and read it again into the RECORD. I read from page 4356, as follows:

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I regret that I was called out of the Chamber so that I could not hear all of the address of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], but he has presented one or two propositions that can not go unchallenged.

One of the propositions to which I referred was his statement that I was defending the action of Japan. This was my answer:

Mr. President, when as a boy I read in the history of the United States what was declared to be a glorious feat on the part of the American Navy, when Admiral Perry, with loaded guns, awoke Japan from her state of lethargy and commanded her to open her ports and Japan opened those ports at his demand, I never could agree that it was a moral act or that it was an act in which we ought to take a great deal of pride. So I agree with the Senator from Idaho that such acts are immoral.

I have never agreed, no matter what great benefit we got out of it, and no matter what great State was added to our Union, that making a war on Mexico to get added territory, by which we could balance the sentiment of one section against that of another section, was a moral act on the part of the United States. I have never agreed that the exercise of the power of Great Britain in compelling China to give her certain rights at Shanghai was in every respect a moral act. I have never asserted that Japan in compelling China to sign a treaty whereby she gave to Japan just what she had to give to other nations was in all respects moral. All I have asserted, Mr. President, is that we are in no position to claim that Japan has committed a wrong against China so long as we visé all of the other acts that have been committed in the same way by every other Caucasian nation of the world.

Of course we would all have been glad if Japan had not attempted to make China give her the same rights that China gave to Great Britain, to France, to Russia, and to other countries; we would be pleased if Great Britain would yield her rights in China back to China and if Japan and Russia would do the same thing; but, Mr. President, we were met with a situation in Paris; we had to deal with conditions as they existed and not as we would wish them to be. I believe that we dealt with the conditions in the best possible way they could have been dealt with at the time.

Notwithstanding the declarations of the Senator from Idaho concerning the infidelity of Japan in all of her past history, I say that I do believe that she will keep this treaty obligation with China; and I have given my reason for so believing.

The first reason is that she has made that promise not to China alone but that she has declared it to every civilized nation upon the face of the earth. Nor is that all. If Japan broke her treaty with Korea, she had a treaty with Korea only, and we could not protest. If she enters into this league and does not keep good her word, then she breaks her treaty with every nation worth mentioning upon the face of the earth; and that, Mr. President, is worth something.

I submit my declaration of what I consider moral and immoral in the treatment of China as against the Senator's version of my position as he gave it this morning.

Mr. President, I think that I have made my position quite clear. In all of the running debate of some hours yesterday afternoon there was never a single argument suggested that met the particular points which I proposed. They are clear and simple. Japan at present holds her rights in Shantung by reason of a treaty with China, and I consider the notes which Japan exchanged with China previous to the signing of the treaty, and which became a part of the treaty, paramount to any claim of right by virtue of any conquest. Yet the two exist, the greater, the more important one, being the treaty with China herself. In that treaty with China Japan agrees that she will return to China the German rights in Shantung and Kiaochow Bay. Senators think that she will not keep her treaty obligation. There is an honest difference of opinion. I think she will in this instance, whether she kept it with Korea or not, and I will not discuss that at this time. I think she will, first, because she has made it clear and definite that, in consideration of China signing the treaty, she will do so; and, second, in addition to that, if the President's recollection is at all accurate, she redeclared that intention in the presence of the four great powers.

In addition to that her official statesmen have again and again declared that that is her promise, and that she will solemnly keep that promise. But what is more important than any of them is this—and I base it upon the league of nations—that if she enters the league of nations she declares by her very signature to that treaty that she will scrupulously keep her treaty obligations, and one of her treaty obligations is that she will return these rights to China. She not only agrees to that, but she agrees further, if she becomes a party to this compact, that upon the complaint of China it may be brought before the council of the league of nations, and that she will obey the award of that council. She not only agrees to that but she agrees that if she does not do so every other country in the world constituting the league may bring to bear upon her and against her the weapons by which their final decision is to be made good.

Taking them all together, I think it is impossible for Japan to escape that treaty obligation. I make that statement irrespective of the morality of her treaty with China or any justification of her treaty with China. I simply assert that, from my standpoint, she was not justified in exacting these promises from China any more than Great Britain or France or Italy were justified in exacting similar promises from China. The only thing that I think Japan is justified in is this: She is justified, from my standpoint of right, in asking China to concede to her a place where her nationals may have a place of residence, exactly the same as she has conceded the same rights to other great nations of the world; and I base my belief in the justice of that cause upon the assumption that Japan, as a great independent power so close to China, with her interests as much at stake as those of any other country, ought to be accorded rights in China not superior but equal to the rights of the other great nations.

Mr. President, the Senator seemed to complain that I had used the words "slap Japan in the face." I did use those words. The Senator says in his discussion that I forgot it. The Senator is mistaken. I did not forget it. I never claimed that I forgot it. I reiterate it. I think it is a slap in the face of Japan. I can not look at it in any other possible way. In all legal controversies a person is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his act, and if one man drives a bowie knife between the ribs of another man up to the hilt there is a reasonable presumption that he intended to kill him. Of course it is not a conclusive presumption. He may prove to the satisfaction of a jury that all he intended to do was to perform an operation for the benefit of the gentleman into whose body he had plunged the dagger. Now, I allow the Senator from New Mexico to make that explanation if it satisfies him, and I will concede that he is making it in good faith, and that he does not think that if the amendment is adopted it will kill the treaty. I simply think it will, and we have a right to disagree upon that point; and we have a right to disagree without the Senator or anybody else declaring that I am justifying Japan in making the treaty that she made with China. I have not justified any of them in all the long history in which those acts have been perpetrated against China.

The Senator again said this morning—and I really think it needs an answer—that in my questioning of him I dropped from yesterday's sublimity to to-day's ridiculousness, or something of that character. I am perfectly willing to admit that. Yesterday I was discussing a great world-wide question, a sublime question, and in getting into the argument with the Senator to-day I will admit that I did get into the pool of his argument; and if I was somewhat stained, I think I should not apologize for it. It was the subject that we were discussing. I simply ask Senators to be as fair with me as I would be with them. Differ if you will; the proposition still faces us that Japan did say to China on the 25th day of May, 1915:

> When, after termination of the present war, the leased territory of Kiaochow Bay is completely left to the free disposal of Japan, the Japanese Government will restore the said leased territory to China under the following conditions:
> 1. The whole of Kiaochow Bay to be opened as a commercial port.

I have heard no objection to that.

> 2. A concession under the exclusive jurisdiction of Japan to be established at a place designated by the Japanese Government.

I can not see anything serious in the second proposition, in the face of the fact that perhaps a dozen or more like concessions have been given to other great countries.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that a great deal of feeling has been developed upon this treaty question, and I do not think the Senator from New Mexico is entirely free from the charge of nervousness, and so forth, which he thinks has affected the other Senators. Certainly his discussion with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] this morning would not indicate that he was making his remarks coolly and deliberately. I believe that we can lay this feeling aside, no matter how bitter any of us might be against the President of the United States; and Heaven knows I am as bitterly opposed to some of his policies as any Senator or any man in the United States. Nevertheless I do not feel that that should enter into this great world question of some method of preventing another such holocaust of blood and misery as has deluged the world during the last four or five years. I believe we can find a way to escape it. I will do my part to make the trial. It may be, possibly, a mistake. I do not think it will be. Many people thought that our great Constitution never would be workable, and we had to make amendments. I have no doubt but that there will be troubles and disputes in the world even after we have agreed upon methods of settlement; but they all tend in the right direction; they all lead toward the goal of peaceful settlement; and I have confidence in the heart and conscience and intelligence of the people of the world and in their ability to work out a scheme, under even this proposed league, that will be successful.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KING. Can the Senator imagine any conditions that will arise or may arise in the future in which China's interests would not be far better served if she and Japan were in the league than if both of them were excluded from the league?

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, I argued that yesterday, and I have not repeated it to-day. I gave the alternative of having Japan and China in the league or of having China and Japan out of the league. If we have them in the league we have them tied up to certain agreements to keep treaties, and to keep them in the very best of faith. If we put them both out, unless we are ready to go to war for our sentiment, then Japan can work her will.

Mr. KING. One other question, if the Senator will pardon me. I would not ask this question except for the fact that the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations have been in the open. Has there been any solicitude evinced by those who have spoken so much about the Shantung proposition to relieve China from the incubus of Great Britain's and France's holdings and concessions in China? In other words, has there been any proposition made before the Senator's committee by those who manifest such a great interest——

Mr. McCUMBER. Not a suggestion. It is all on the one subject of Japan.

Mr. KING. I will ask the Senator, then, one further question: Is it not manifest from the attitude taken, or is it not a proper, legitimate deduction from the attitude taken, that the Shantung proposition, urged here so fiercely by opponents of the treaty, is used as a sort of a bogey man to frighten people against the treaty?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator has answered the question by his question.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there are no further amendments to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I understood that there were some amendments to be offered. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I understand, has some amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Wisconsin has 15 amendments printed. I have copies of them on my desk. He was here a minute ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no amendments to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Wisconsin is entering the Chamber now.

Mr. KING. I do not think the Presiding Officer should so peremptorily order the bill reported to the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Senate. After having spoken with interruptions for over three hours,

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is now a quarter past 5 o'clock. The Senator from Wisconsin has been speaking for more than three hours, and no doubt he will not be able to finish this evening.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall not be able to finish this evening.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am going to move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, and I ask Senators not to interfere to-morrow with the consideration of this bill. We have had it before the Senate for some time, and let us see if we can not dispose of it to-morrow. Let us discuss the bill and allow nothing outside to interfere with its consideration. I sincerely hope that this suggestion will be agreeable to the Senate.

I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, August 28, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 27, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Spirit, above, beneath, around, within, so near and yet so far, stir our souls, make us conscious of Thy presence, inspire us with clearer vision, larger life, that we may move forward as a nation in these days of reconstruction with the same patriotic zeal that moved our fathers, who gave us a Nation for the good of mankind; that all our people may be ready to sacrifice for its maintenance, that the prevalent unrest may pass away and the normal come to bless us and all the world. In the Christ spirit. Amen.

A QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that there is no quorum present. It is obvious that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and eighty-seven Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. If it is not out of order, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] whether Republican differences have been sufficiently ironed out after last night's caucus to now take up the soldiers' relief bill and consider it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

THE AMERICAN LEGION.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business before the House is the bill which was pending on last Wednesday for the incorporation of the American Legion. When we adjourned a reconsideration was ordered on the Gard amendment, so that the question before the House is on agreeing to the Gard amendment. Without objection, the Gard amendment will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 7, after the word "and," strike out "November 11, 1918," and insert "the date of the conclusion of the Great War, to be evidenced by the proclamation of the President of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to correct the amendment which was adopted by the House last Wednesday to include the State chairmen as members of the incorporators of the American Legion. I find that mistakes have been made in the spelling of four names, and that five of the names of State chairmen should be changed by reason of the fact that others have since been regularly elected by the returned soldiers in place of those who were acting temporarily as State chairmen.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know where the gentleman gets his information.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have obtained this information from Mr. Thomas W. Miller, a former Congressman from Delaware and a returned soldier, who is here in Washington looking after this bill in behalf of the American Legion. The information furnished him came from the national headquarters of the American Legion in New York City.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment?

Mr. SEARS. Reserving the right to object, is there any chance of further changes being made before we pass the bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; the list of names I have is correct to date.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send his amendment to the Clerk's desk. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HAYDEN:
Connecticut—Alfred M. Phillips, jr., instead of Alfred A. Phillips.
Tennessee—Roane Waring instead of Roan Waring.
Texas—Claude V. Birkhead instead of Claud B. Birkhead.
Virginia—Charles Francis Cocke instead of Francis Cocke.
Alabama—Mathew H. Murphy instead of Bibb Graves.
Kentucky—Henry DeHaven Moorman instead of A. Hilla Cox.
Nevada—J. G. Scrugham instead of E. L. Malsbary.
South Dakota—M. L. Shade instead of T. R. Johnson.
Wisconsin—John C. Davis instead of E. F. Ackley.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have here a list which contains all the corrections that have been read. I would like to substitute this new list for the entire amendment.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. What is the gentleman asking to do?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman first offered an amendment, which the Clerk has reported. If that amendment is adopted, will it not accomplish what the gentleman wishes to do?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his request. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Arizona.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to strike out the preamble.

The amendment striking out the preamble was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. VOLSTEAD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The call still rests with the Committee on the Judiciary.

AFFIDAVITS IN CERTAIN CASES.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2236) relating to affidavits required by the act entitled "An act to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That where any judgment has been entered since March 8, 1918, in any action or proceeding commenced in any court where there was a failure to file in such action the affidavits required by section 200 of article 2 of the act approved March 8, 1918, entitled "An act to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war" (40 Stat. L., p. 440), the plaintiff may file an affidavit stating that the defendant, or defendants, in default in such judgments, are not at the time of such filing, and were not at the time of the entry of such judgment, in the naval or military service of the United States, and upon the filing of such affidavit the court may enter an order that such judgment shall stand and be effective as of the date of the entry thereof. Any person who shall make or use such an affidavit as aforesaid, knowing it to be false, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punishable by imprisonment not to exceed one year, or by fine not to exceed $1,000, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, this bill has passed the Senate and has been reported unanimously by the Judiciary Committee of the House. Its object is to validate certain judgments that have been entered since the adoption of the soldiers' and sailors' relief act. Section 200 of that act provides that before a person can obtain a judgment by default it is necessary that he shall show by an affidavit that the defendant is not in military or naval service, or that the plaintiff has no knowledge whether the defendant is in such service or not, or that the defendant is in such service. He must file an affidavit setting forth one of those three statements before a judgment can be entered.

The exact terms of this act are not generally known throughout the country, and in many instances where the plaintiff knew that the defendant was not a soldier or sailor plaintiff neglected to file the required affidavit. That was natural enough. I am informed that many courts have held that these judgments are void, that the filing of such an affidavit is jurisdictional. This bill is intended to give relief in those cases by permitting those affidavits to be filed now for then, or nunc pro tunc, as the lawyers say. The affidavits ought to have been filed at the time the judgment was entered; but where they fail to do it, no harm can be done by allowing the filing at this time. The soldiers' and sailors' relief act was not intended to protect people not in the military or naval service. It was intended to protect soldiers and sailors, and the passage of this bill will not affect them, but it will permit plaintiffs who through an error have failed to file the required affidavit as against persons not in the service to obtain valid judgments.

It seems to me that we ought to permit that. I think it is in line with what has been done in a great many instances by legislation. It is purely a curative act, and in view of the injury that has resulted to innocent but mistaken people, it seems to me we ought to allow this matter to be corrected. I am told that there are a number of judgments for divorce against people not in the military or naval service and not entitled to any consideration under the soldiers' and sailors' relief act that are subject to be set aside because of this defect. There are also many cases where land titles are involved. All of us who are lawyers are aware of the fact that in many instances judgments by default are frequently entered against lands, entered in rem, as it is called. No doubt in many such cases plaintiffs have failed to file the proper affidavits.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does this act provide for any notice to the party adversely affected?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Not specifically. Application must be made to the court for the relief provided, and it would be within the discretion of the court.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Should there not be an absolute requirement that the party adversely interested be notified of the application? In other words, you are taking a second judgment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. One of the troubles about that would be this: In many instances you could not find the defendant.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. There is a procedure prescribed by which action shall be taken in lieu of personal service?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; there can be service by publication. I am aware of that.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. It seems to me it is a very grave question to validate an absolutely void judgment, as the gentleman says, without notice to the party against whom the judgment is to be made binding.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I would not have any serious objection to amending the bill as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that he prepare such an amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I beg to suggest to the chairman of the committee that very likely many defendants knowing that no affidavits had been filed may have purposely omitted to enter an appearance, knowing that the judgment would be void. He knew at the time that jurisdiction was not obtained because no affidavit had been filed. That being so, it seems rather important that he should have notice, and if he can not be found such notice be given as is usual in chancery cases.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I would not object if the House sees fit to amend the bill in that respect. The defendant could not, however, know that the affidavit would not be filed until after the judgment had been entered.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Is it the position of the gentleman that in all suits filed in the courts of the various States, Federal and State, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to file an affidavit stating whether or not the defendant was in the military service?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. By the act already referred to it was made incumbent where a person sought judgment by default to file in all the courts—it made no difference whether it was Federal or State court—an affidavit stating that the defendant was not in the military or naval service. It was the only way that we could see that would protect the soldier and sailor.

Mr. KEARNS. As I understand, the law is that the affidavit must be filed when the suit is filed. When the petition is filed there would be no knowledge on the part of the plaintiff whether judgment was going to be by default or not.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not catch the gentleman's idea.

Mr. KEARNS. My understanding of the law is that the affidavit is to be filed at the time of the filing of the petition, that the affidavit should accompany the petition. Is that true?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; that would depend upon the practice of the various States. In my State a person would not have to file the petition until he applied for the judgment.

Mr. KEARNS. Is it incumbent on the plaintiff in all suits where the case has gone to final judgment, before final judgment is taken, to file an affidavit stating whether or not the defendant is in the military service or was in the military or naval service of the United States?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; if he seeks a judgment by default, then the affidavit is necessary. If there is an appearance, the affidavit is not necessary.

Mr. KEARNS. But it is necessary in a judgment by default?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; where there is no appearance by the defendant.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman says that such an affidavit is necessary in all the courts?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. All the courts of the land.

Mr. KEARNS. But that has not been the practice, has it?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I am informed that in a great many instances plaintiffs have failed to file the affidavit where they knew the defendants were not in the military or naval service.

Mr. KEARNS. I see that the report speaks of cases, especially in matters of divorce. If the defendant does not appear, that is a judgment by default, although testimony is taken in the case.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Of course.

Mr. KEARNS. In a suit of that sort has it been held necessary by the courts that there must be an affidavit?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; so I am informed.

Mr. KEARNS. Would that be necessary in a suit where the husband has applied for a divorce from his wife?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; for the reason that she might be in the military service.

Mr. KEARNS. Suppose it is generally known that the defendant was not in the military service.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That makes no difference, the record must show it.

Mr. KEARNS. The record must show it?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; because it is made a statutory requisite for a judgment; the affidavit must be filed in all suits where defendant fails to appear.

Mr. KEARNS. I see that the bill is retroactive. How far back does it go?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. To March 8, 1918.

Mr. KEARNS. Is that the date of the passage of the law?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. As I understand the situation, in a certain class of cases in order to obtain an enforceable judgment the plaintiff must file the affidavit.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. In cases of a certain character you propose to validate an unenforceable judgment. Why should you do that? Might it not very well be that the defendant allowed the case to go to judgment by default because the plaintiff had not taken the necessary steps to get an enforceable judgment?

Are you not taking advantage of a defendant by rendering valid a judgment not enforceable and which he may have permitted to be entered against him because he knew that it was not enforceable?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If there is any objection on that ground, an amendment can be inserted that notice must be given to the defendant before entering the judgment, and then the court can take all these matters into consideration.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. These cases have been finally adjudicated for nearly a year. Before that judgment can become lawful and binding is it not necessary to reopen the case and give further notice to the defendant?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think probably it would be a good idea to require notice to the defendant. I think there are circumstances where it might be proper, as suggested by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. KEARNS. In a divorce suit where the parties have been married again, is it necessary for the plaintiff to the suit to have the case reopened?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It does not necessarily have to be reopened.

Mr. KEARNS. It would be necessary to reopen the case if you gave notice to the defendant?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; only notice of the filing of this affidavit should be given.

Mr. KEARNS. And if that is true and one of the parties is remarried, and on further hearing upon the part of the court the testimony of the defendant would be heard, and this might show that the former judgment of the court was wrong. Suppose there is a divorce, and in the subsequent proceeding a verdict given showing the divorce had not been granted, and the parties are remarried.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is one of the reasons we want this bill passed.

Mr. KEARNS. It is one of the reasons why it will make trouble.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; because if that is a void judgment you have trouble already.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. They would be guilty of bigamy.

Mr. KEARNS. It would not be a void judgment, because the court had granted it in good faith; it might be voidable.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is a question. If there is a lack of jurisdiction, it is a void judgment. I believe such a judgment would only be held voidable.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Do I understand the gentleman's suggestion to be that you can take a judgment which is now unenforceable because of the failure to file this affidavit and breathe life into it by filing the affidavit now?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think there is any doubt about that, if defendant has had the proper notice. It is then one of those cases where, after jurisdiction has been obtained, plaintiff has neglected to comply with some requirement made a condition for entering the judgment. If he had filed the affidavit at the time it was entered, the judgment would be valid; we now ask that he may file it at this time as of the time at which it ought to have been filed. It is a nunc pro tunc proceeding that we seek to authorize.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. And the defendant may have permitted it to go to judgment, fully appreciating the fact that the plaintiff had not taken the steps necessary to obtain a valid judgment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not see how he could do that, for this reason: Up to the time plaintiff makes application for judgment by default there has been no default in the filing of this affidavit. The affidavit comes at the time of the application for judgment; hence defendant can suffer default because the affidavit has not been filed.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. As a matter of practice in some jurisdictions you get your judgment automatically; you do not have to follow it up.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. In one sense that is true.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. You ought not to permit an invalid judgment to be made valid by the filing of this affidavit, unless you open the case up de novo and allow the defendant an opportunity to defend on the merits, it seems to me.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think that would be fair, for this reason: When plaintiff makes his application for judgment the defendant's rights have been fixed. You do not have to file this affidavit until that time; that is, plaintiff files the affidavit at that time and in connection with his application for the judgment, so that the situation that the gentleman from Maine suggests can never exist.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. I was talking about a case where it had gone to final judgment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. And the parties have obtained new rights under that judgment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Well?

Mr. KEARNS. If you allow that case to be reopened, give notice to the defendant, and he decides that he wants to be heard this time, and he can present a state of facts that would show that the court erred in rendering the first judgment——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. But if it is not a judgment, what good is it to you? If on the face of the record he has not a judgment, it seems to me, in view of that situation, that the position of the gentleman is not tenable.

Mr. KEARNS. But he has a judgment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; he has not, according to the decisions of some courts.

Mr. KEARNS. But some courts have held that he has.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is not valid.

Mr. KEARNS. Some courts have held that he has a valid judgment, and some have held that he has not.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think so.

Mr. KEARNS. That is true in every State in the Union. They have been rendering these verdicts. The entry has gone on by which the plaintiff has been granted certain rights under the judgment, and he has exercised those rights, believing he had them.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If they hold it valid, the court would continue to hold it valid, regardless of the filing of this affidavit.

Mr. KEARNS. Then what is the object of this law?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Because the court holds these judgments void.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. As I understand it, the act as it stands at present does not give the court power, according to the construction in some States, to enter judgment without this affidavit first being filed.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is correct.

Mr. BRIGGS. And any judgment that is predicated upon any such proceedings is absolutely void, according to the construction given it in some States. This is a corrective act.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; a curative act.

Mr. BRIGGS. Of course the gentleman does not contend that you can make a judgment by legislative decree.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Oh, no.

Mr. BRIGGS. This bill here would seem to make it simply a pro forma or formal proceeding to correct judgment when it was called to the attention of the court; but it occurs to me that it is absolutely necessary to give the adverse party some kind of notice, to give due process of law in the first place, and, in fact, to do more than that, so as to keep this from being an ex post facto proceeding, and not really make a judgment or give grounds for one where there was none before.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I have no objection against authorizing notice in proper cases. Personally I do not think it would be necessary. Defendant has already been served with notice and jurisdiction has been obtained. This bill provides a proceeding for the purpose of validating a judgment, voidable not because of lack of jurisdiction but because of failure to exercise that jurisdiction properly. The defendant has had his day in court.

Mr. BRIGGS. I think that the chairman is more nearly correct when he says that courts would hold it voidable rather than void. It is something that may be taken advantage of, and yet would not involve invalidity of the decision.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I spoke of it in a general way as being void, because anything that is voidable is often called that though incorrectly.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understand that the chairman has no objection to a provision providing that a certain notice should be given preliminary to the entry of any order?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In a proceeding of this kind something was said that an affidavit should be served personally, and every defendant should have personal notice of the correction of the record by the filing of this affidavit. Now, if a personal notice is necessary, and then proceedings in rem, in a good many instances they might give the same notice as required by the rules of court where they want to amend their proceedings by publication.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. You could not always give by personal notice, because you might not be able to find the party, and the notice required, if any is required, should be served the same as the service of a summons.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In that case the rules provide that the parties—one, two, three, or more—if it is deemed necessary, should have notice.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. KEARNS. Does the gentleman mean to say in all cases now, even though it is known the defendant was not in the military or the naval service at the time stated, or was not at any time, although it is well known, it is necessary, before he can have a valid judgment, to have that affidavit filed? Is that the gentleman's position?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is the position, and that is the reason why this bill has been prepared and passed in the Senate.

Mr. KEARNS. I want to ask this question: That law was passed for one purpose. It is only for two classes of persons who could get the benefit of it. Those persons were members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States. Now, if the records in court on this suit are absolutely silent, would it not be presumed that this man or woman, however that may be, was not in the Military or Naval Establishment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Oh, no; we have made it an affirmative duty upon the part of the plaintiff to file it. The presumption is one that can be rebutted.

Mr. KEARNS. It all refers to two classes of persons—those in the military and naval services; and if it is well known to everyone that the defendant was not in either one of the services——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. But you have to make the proof; the law requires it.

Mr. KEARNS. It does not require it, because that refers to two classes of men.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It refers to all classes.

Mr. KEARNS. It says "an act to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments," and so forth.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It expressly provides that plaintiff must file an affidavit showing that defendant is not in the military service just as much as he is required to file an affidavit showing defendant is in such service.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. Assuming the defendant, on the advice of counsel, utterly disregarded the suit on the ground that it was void through failure to answer this necessary allegation in the complaint. Now, does the gentleman think it is the proper course to validate that judgment simply by the filing of an affidavit, even if it is upon notice? It seems to me that if you do that, you are going to give the plaintiff a very great advantage.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The gentleman is entirely mistaken as to the proceedings. No mention of this affidavit is made in the complaint at all. When you present your proof for the purpose of showing the defendant has not made an appearance, with a view of obtaining a judgment by default, then you must file your affidavit, so that the situation the gentleman suggests is not in the case at all.

Mr. HUSTED. The gentleman means that it is necessary to allege the fact in the complaint that the defendant was not in the military or naval service of the United States?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Oh, no; you plead just the same as you always did. If defendant appears, no affidavit is required; but in case he fails to appear, then, in order to apply for judgment, you must file it; consequently the rights of the defendant have been fixed by his default, and plaintiff is entitled to a judgment if he makes the showing that defendant is not in the military or naval service.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Suppose this affidavit is filed in a suit that has been long since finally adjudicated, stating that the defendant, he or she, was not a member of the Military or Naval Establishments at the time that the suit was pending. That would reopen the case, as I understand it?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think so.

Mr. KEARNS. Then what is the use of filing it, if the defendant is not to have any benefits or rights under it?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The defendant's rights were barred when the plaintiff obtained the judgment. He was in default and the plaintiff was entitled to the judgment. The affidavit, when filed, simply complies with a technicality required in entering that judgment. It does not seem to me that the defendant need be notified at all, in view of the situation, because he had forfeited his rights to appear and answer. The only occasion for a notice that I can see is as to third parties whose rights may be affected.

Mr. KEARNS. I misunderstood the answer to the inquiry I made a while ago, then. I understood they reopened the case.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I have said that I do not object if you would require notice in these cases.

Mr. BRIGGS. If the gentleman will yield, it has been suggested that the status of those proceedings, anyway, simply leaves them without any valid judgment, but this leaves the case simply in the attitude of no default having actually been declared. They admit the default could not be taken, because the affidavit has not been filed. It simply defers the judgment to which the party is entitled. On the filing of the affidavit the party becomes entitled to his judgment. The provisions of this bill make it retroactive. I do not think under the Constitution the judgment should be made effective as of the date of the prior entry, but should be made of the date of the entry of this proceeding.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think it could and should.

Mr. BRIGGS. I do not think you could go back to that, because if the court had no power to enter it at that time it is simply an open proceeding. I do not think now, under the further consideration, that probable notice would be required. It would simply be a case where the party had not answered.

Mr. SANFORD. If the gentleman will yield, on page 2, line 6, where you attempt to make the judgment valid from the date of the entry, does that mean from the date of the entry of judgment originally or from the date of the entry of the order?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The date of the entry of the judgment.

Mr. SANFORD. I want to say to the gentleman that I am very sure there is no rule of law that will guide the courts to the conclusion the committee has in mind. There is no rule of law that I have ever been able to find that will determine to what antecedent noun "thereof" refers to. I think under this law, if you leave it as it is, the court will have the obligation of interpretation and will have to guess whether the judgment is to be effective from the date of the entry of the order or from the date of the entry of the judgment. I do not think you will find in law or syntax any very reliable rule for guiding you to know to what noun "thereof" refers to. I think if your purpose is clear in that connection you should say "from the date of the original entry of the judgment."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I would not object to that, if the bill is to be amended at all, though I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Mr. SANFORD. The gentleman ought to have in mind that there seems to be no doubt about this original law; but when you attempt to operate laws that you write in unclear language, with your eyes open, you must expect to write law that will cause trouble hereafter from time to time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Well, I did not happen to write this.

Mr. SANFORD. I know the gentleman did not; but he has the writing of this act now, and I think it is well to make it clear now.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I understand in a proceeding it is not necessary to allege that the defendant is in the military or naval service. Now, when you bring suit against a man, take out judgment, and then you attempt to levy on real estate and come to sell it under your execution, how does the man know who may be thinking of purchasing at that sale whether there may not be an affidavit coming in later on that may affect the whole proceeding and his title under that sale? In other words, does not this process throw a cloud on every judgment that is issued?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No. This is to remove clouds, validate sales, and prevent litigation.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Suppose a man secures judgment and levies on real estate and has a sale; then has not the defendant before him all the time the possibility that the plaintiff may come in and file an affidavit and validate the whole proceeding which he has assumed is invalid? And in that respect would you not be throwing a doubt on every judgment that is issued?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We are making judgments valid instead of making them doubtful.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I was going to say the purpose of this is not to invalidate a judgment, and it could not do it under this law, but it is to validate it.

Mr. KEARNS. Suppose this affidavit is filed stating that during all the time of the pendency of the suit up to final judgment the defendant was not in the military or naval service, will it be necessary after that affidavit is filed to have another court entry made reaffirming the former entry after the affidavit has been filed, setting forth that the defendant was not at any time during the pendency of the suit and up to the time of final judgment——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Filed under the proposed act?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes; filed under the proposed act—an affidavit that the defendant was not in the military or naval service? Then there would have to be another court entry.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The order is to be made on that affidavit.

Mr. KEARNS. Yes. Now, if the court entry has been made, suppose the defendant appears and files an affidavit that he was at some time during the pendency of that suit, or all the time during the pendency of that suit, in neither the military or naval service, that would be a reopening of the case, would it not?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If at the time the judgment was entered defendant was in the military or naval service he could have the judgment reopened.

Mr. KEARNS. We ought to know something about the law before we vote on it. The gentleman is as good a lawyer as you can find over here in the Supreme Court, perhaps. [Applause.] Would he admit that? In our State, when a suit is brought against a nonresident who happens to own some real estate in the county in which the suit is brought, that real estate can be attached and service can be obtained by publication, although you do not know where the man lives, even, or where the defendant lives.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes. That is good law everywhere.

Mr. KEARNS. Now, then, no one knows in that county—the plaintiff does not know—whether that man or woman was at that time in the naval or military service and could not file such an affidavit and can not now file the affidavit, because in many instances they do not know where the defendant resides, although that case has gone to final judgment and the rights have gone to final judgment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The gentleman is in error. Section 200 does not say that you shall file just one kind of an affidavit. If you file an affidavit that you do not know whether defendant is in the naval or military service you can get a judgment by applying to the court. The case that the gentleman suggests is taken care of in the statute itself and does not come within the purview of this bill at all.

Mr. KEARNS. Suppose, now, in such a case that the defendant has been apprised of the judgment obtained against him some months ago and comes back to that State and county when this affidavit is filed and sets up his defense through a counter-affidavit that he was at that time in the military or naval service?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is no provision in this law for counteraffidavits.

Mr. KEARNS. There is certainly some way for him to get into court.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; the soldiers' and sailors' relief act makes provision for that.

Mr. KEARNS. I would like to have the gentleman's view on this question: We will take the case of a nonresident who owns real estate in the county in which a suit is sought to be brought, and that real estate is attached and service is had by publication. At the time of the pendency, or any time during the pendency of the suit before final judgment, the required affidavit was not filed, but by virtue of this law which we are now trying to pass, if we do pass it, the plaintiff in that case comes into court and files an affidavit setting forth that he does not know whether the defendant was in the military or naval service or not. But suppose that the defendant has learned of this suit in some way——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It does not come under the proposed act at all.

Mr. KEARNS. Suppose, then, that he does file the affidavit stating that he was not either in the military or naval service during the pendency of the suit?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Then he has a valid judgment.

Mr. KEARNS. But supposing this defendant comes in and in some way makes it known to the court that he was in the military or naval service?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. He has got to apply to the court for relief under some equitable right or some particular statutory provision. He may apply under the soldiers' and sailors' relief act.

Mr. KEARNS. But what would that be?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That would depend upon the circumstances.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. As I understand it, this bill is not to give the defendant a new trial. If he has ground for a new trial, to open the case under the law, he has that right now; but this bill would not give the defendant the privilege of proceeding under a new trial by the passage of this bill.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No.

Mr. HASTINGS. But if this bill is passed you allow him to file the affidavit that he should have filed nunc pro tunc?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. If the plaintiff is guilty of laches, ought he not to file an affidavit to revise the judgment rather than by the method suggested by the gentleman?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The defendant is not entitled to any special consideration. He was not a soldier or sailor and the act requiring this affidavit was not passed for his benefit. He has failed to answer a complaint, petition, or whatever you call the pleading, and should not be heard to claim the advantages designed for the benefit of the men in the service. All we do is simply this: If plaintiff has neglected to file an affidavit that we did not design for his protection, he has no right to complain because we deprive him of such protection.

Mr. BEE. Under those circumstances, having failed to file an affidavit, does it not become absolutely a dead judgment, without any life, and therefore ought he not either to file an affidavit to revive the judgment or enter a new suit in order to keep within the legal bounds?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think so.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I wish to say in response to what has been suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] that this applies only to cases of default, and if it had not been for the act which this bill proposes to amend, whenever the defendant was in default the plaintiff was thereupon and by reason of that fact entitled to a judgment.

Mr. BEE. Yes; judgment by default.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. This act which the bill amends was not intended to protect anybody except soldiers and sailors, and they are not affected in the least by this amendatory act, and consequently the defendant, when he is in default and is not a soldier or sailor, is out of court. He is entitled to be heard no further. And it occurs to me that it may frequently happen that the plaintiff was not guilty of any laches, but that he was unable to make the affidavit as required by the original act because of lack of information or the ability to make a searching investigation.

Mr. BEE. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to ask, as a lawyer and as a man who has been upon the bench, where the statute requires that an affidavit shall be made in order to secure judgment by default against the defendant, what becomes of the judgment secured without this affidavit? Does it not become absolutely a dead judgment, only revivable by a direct proceeding to revive judgment or by a new suit?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. That would depend upon circumstances, and I understand that the courts in some jurisdictions have held one way and in other jurisdictions have held otherwise.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman permit me to answer my colleague?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not this the law, that the presumption of law is that all matters and things have been properly complied with until the contrary appears?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. That all proper proceedings have been taken.

Mr. BLANTON. That all proper procedure has been complied with; and, if the judgment is voidable by reason of something not having been complied with, then upon proper showing and affirmative action to have the judgment set aside, it is so ordered. Is not that the law?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. If that be the case, that all proceedings are presumed to have been regular and correct, what is the necessity for this legislation?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Because the defendant can apply to the court and show that the affidavit has not been filed.

Mr. BLANTON. It gives a remedy to the plaintiff.

Mr. BEE. You are providing for opening up the litigation without notice to the defendant.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think so. It would not give a retrial of the action at all.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is not this to protect the plaintiff against the action of a defendant attacking the judgment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes. I presume a judgment entered in a court not of record would be void on its face. A judgment entered in a court of record would be presumed to be valid until it was made to appear by a proceeding in the action itself that it was voidable.

Mr. McKEOWN. The language of the original act provided that no judgment should be entered until certain things were done.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Until the filing of the affidavit.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is not the gentleman of the opinion that a judgment entered in the face of that act is a void judgment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We very often use the expression "void" when we mean "voidable," and when I used the language "void" the idea which I had in mind was voidable rather than absolutely void. I think it is true that a judgment entered in an inferior court, not of record, may be void, because in an inferior court not of record the rule is, if I remember it, that the jurisdictional facts must appear affirmatively upon the face of the proceedings; but this is not a jurisdictional fact in the sense that a failure to serve the defendant or to acquire control of property by proper proceedings would be jurisdictional. The judgment is erroneous, the facts exist upon which the court has a right to act, but the proof of it by the statutory affidavit has not been filed and I believe we can authorize that it be filed.

Mr. McKEOWN. The act says that judgment shall not be entered unless the affidavit is filed, or an order of the court obtained.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is no specific requirement in the original act that an order shall be made——

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. And in that same connection, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, the act provides that the court may enter an order that such judgment shall stand and be effective as of the date of the entry thereof; and if the defendant should come up and controvert the filing of that affidavit, it would be for the court to determine as to whether he was a soldier or sailor, and of course the court would proceed in the disposition of the matter in such a manner as to satisfy himself that justice was done.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think that language would make it the duty of the court to determine whether under the circumstances it was proper or necessary to give notice to the parties interested before the judgment was entered. For that reason I think there is very little reason for amending the bill.

Mr. BEE. This bill was originally passed for the protection of men of the military service.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. For the protection of soldiers and sailors.

Mr. BEE. Against judgment by default.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. This resolves itself into a controversy between a plaintiff who is not a soldier or sailor and a defendant who is not a soldier or sailor.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes. Plaintiff need not be a soldier or sailor.

Mr. BEE. What more sanctity should there be to the action of the plaintiff who has been guilty of neglect to comply with the law than there should be in favor of a defendant who may have been guilty of neglect to file an answer? Why should the plaintiff be given any more protection?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Let us stop and look at the situation. Here is a man who has gone to work in good faith and put in his money and commenced a suit. Through an oversight, unaware of the existence of this statute, he has failed to file an affidavit that is of no earthly consequence to the defendant. The defendant is not interested in it at all, the defendant is not injured at all, because he is not a soldier or a sailor. We never intended to protect him at all. But the situation was this, that we had to compel everybody to make this showing. Otherwise they would go and enter judgment against soldiers and sailors. I do not think a plaintiff ought to be penalized. In this country with its thousands of judges, justices, and courts of various kinds it would be strange indeed if they all knew of this statute.

Mr. BEE. They ought to know about it. The presumption is that everybody knows the law.

Mr. RUCKER. That presumption applies only to laymen and not to judges. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEE. The presumption ought to run against the lawyer who brings the suit.

Mr. PELL. It seems to me either the title to the subject of the suit is in the plaintiff absolutely, in which case there is no need of any further law to protect him, or else that it is in doubt; and if it is in doubt, I should think that the defendant would have the right to appear. There will be many cases coming up where a man might own a few acres of land away from his home. Judgment is entered against him. He does not think it worth while to defend the suit but lets it go by default. It develops that the plaintiff did not attend to this particular requirement. You validate the plaintiff's title. Now, if there was any other formality in court omitted——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The defendant in these cases has no equity at all.

Mr. PELL. If the plaintiff has forgotten any other technicality of law, the defendant can take advantage of it. Why should this particular technicality be excepted any more than any other—for instance, in certain States where they require a given number of witnesses on a bond, or where affidavits have not been properly sworn to and the judgment is overruled because of the technicality of the law which has not been complied with. Why should this particular technicality be excepted rather than any other?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Well, it seems to me that we ought to relieve these cases where the defendants have no real merit in the contention. We required the making of these affidavits, and why should we encourage these technicalities?

Mr. PELL. If a man came into a New York court with a statement sworn to before a New Jersey justice or New Jersey notary, he would be told that his case had collapsed because it was not properly sworn to. We do not defend him, but we say that his lawyer should have known better. Now we are picking out this particular technicality and excepting it from all others. I sympathize with the purposes of the bill.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The fact that you may find other technicalities in the record ought not to be any reason why we should not cure this.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion on a case that I will state that came under my observation. A husband was an actor, and of course his wife thought he was a bad actor and filed a suit for divorce against him. He was then living in Chicago and she was living in Ohio. She filed a suit. He knew of the pendency of the suit and received a copy of the petition.

Within a week after he received a copy of the petition for divorce he enlisted in the military service or the naval service, and I think he is still there. She did not know of this until after the divorce was granted, although she knew at the time the petition was filed that he was not in the service.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. This legislation would have nothing to do with that case because the affidavit must be filed at the time the judgment is obtained by default, and at that time he was in the military service.

Mr. KEARNS. If this bill becomes a law, would it not be necessary for her to file an affidavit of some sort?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; that is an entirely different kind of a case. This bill only applies to parties who were not in the military service at the time the judgment was entered.

Mr. KEARNS. He was in the military service at the time the judgment was entered.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; and for that reason this legislation would not apply; this only applies to those not in the service. It does not affect the soldiers or the sailors at all.

Mr. KEARNS. What would be the effect of the divorce under the circumstances I have mentioned?

Mr. BEE. Are there any judgments by default? These would only be in the Federal courts.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It covers every court in the land.

Mr. BEE. In the State of Texas we have our own legislation on these lines.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Well, you have this law too.

Mr. BEE. What becomes of our legislation?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. You, no doubt, have hundreds of judgments in your State that ought to be validated.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. As I understand, the purpose is to enable plaintiffs who have gone into the Federal courts, generally speaking——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Any court in the land.

Mr. RUCKER. Well, any court, to perfect the judgment they have obtained.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If the defendants are not in the military service.

Mr. RUCKER. I am satisfied, from what little observation I have had, that any judge of a State court would see that the law had been complied with as to the filing of the affidavit, and perhaps the Federal court would do the same thing; but I have seen so many funny things done in the Federal courts that, for one. I am not disposed to give any consolation whatever to a man who brings a suit in the Federal courts. Therefore I am a little disposed to vote against the gentleman's bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think it is true that you will find the omission almost entirely in the State courts. In my State the judge does not see the entry of judgment by default. The parties go to the clerk of the court and file the necessary affidavit and get judgment. In a great many instances, I presume, the clerks do not know anything about this requirement.

Mr. RUCKER. That is a terrible reflection on the courts of the State of Minnesota. I think they do know about it, and, if they do not, the man that goes into court to bring a lawsuit ought to know about it.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. This is designed to correct the errors of a plaintiff's lawyer in securing judgment. I want to ask the gentleman what will happen if a false affidavit is made and filed in a case and the defendant was in the service at the time the judgment was rendered; what would be the situation with reference to the judgment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The gentleman says a false affidavit?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; under this bill he might file a false affidavit. Do I understand that, although the affidavit is false and the defendant knows nothing of the affidavit—does that render the judgment a valid judgment if the defendant was actually in the service?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; I think it would. But that is one of the consequences of every proceeding, and the judgment could be set aside under the law. We have false affidavits and false testimony; perjury is punished by fine and imprisonment.

Mr. DOWELL. Oh, I understand about the fine; but what I am getting at is this: Here is a plaintiff who files a false affidavit on a judgment that has been rendered before, and under this bill——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended for two minutes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, on Calendar Wednesday there are two hours of debate—one hour controlled, in this instance, by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and the other hour by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD]. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] can yield if he wishes to do so.

Mr. DOWELL. I think by unanimous consent this might be granted.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair it can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. The affidavit that is filed under this bill is conclusive, and makes the judgment valid, even though it be untrue, and known to the plaintiff to be untrue.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Not any more than it would if it had been filed at the time the judgment was taken. If it is a false affidavit that matter can be shown, and application can be made to have it set aside.

Mr. DOWELL. Except this: I take it that if the affidavit had been filed at the time of judgment application would be made to set it aside, but under this bill it makes the judgment final and conclusive. I am submitting that suggestion.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PARRISH. Does not the provision of the bill where it says the court may render judgment leave it within the discretion of the court?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Certainly. There are cases where he ought not to validate the judgment.

Mr. PARRISH. I think that would answer the question of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. But if he does render judgment, that is final.

Mr. PARRISH. It would be a question of appeal.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. There are provisions in every State that in case of fraud and in certain other instances, within a certain length of time, the court may grant an order for rehearing and set aside judgment. I think the same rule of law in the various jurisdictions would apply.

Mr. DOWELL. Except for this bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended for one minute more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINKAID. It being admitted that this judgment was absolutely void——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Or voidable.

Mr. KINKAID. Because of the absence of the essential affidavits, would not this bill in its form conflict with the Constitution of the United States, which provides that a defendant's property may not be taken without due process of law?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think so.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, the bill S. 2236, under consideration, came to the House, after it had passed the Senate, without any consideration in the Senate at all except the fact that it was introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. There was no discussion in the Senate, and there was little or no discussion in the Committee on the Judiciary. The first discussion that has been accorded this measure has been had on the floor of the House this morning. Therefore I feel privileged, although a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, to speak to the merits of the bill. I know the members of the committee are likewise interested in knowing just what the bill provides. I think the bill should be amended in certain very important particulars, to which I would call attention, if I may have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I would be glad to inform him of what they are. The gentleman not paying heed, I shall proceed. In line 3, page 1, the bill provides—

That where any judgment has been entered since March 4, 1918, in any action or proceeding commenced in any court where there was a failure to file in such action the affidavits required by section 200 of article 2 of the act approved March 8, 1918—

although there never had been service of summons upon the defendant, still by the filing of an affidavit which this bill authorizes judgment may be obtained and judgment validated. I do not believe that by the filing of any affidavit you can validate an invalid judgment. That is precisely what this bill undertakes to do. It would be an anomaly in the law——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield, although I tried to attract the attention of the gentleman and could not.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Does the gentleman say that one can get a judgment here without having a summons served?

Mr. GARD. I say that under this bill that is what you do. If judgment has been taken erroneously, and you file an affidavit under this bill, it makes the whole judgment valid. I say you can not make an illegal judgment legal by the filing of an affidavit, which affidavit itself may be untrue. There is no theory of law under which a judgment which is absolutely void because of lack of correct procedure can be validated by the filing of a subsequent affidavit, which subsequent affidavit may itself be untrue, and I desire to speak to that principle.

Therefore, the amendment I propose, first, is that, in line 3 of page 1, after the word—I see the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, is apparently about to leave the Chamber and I would like to have his attention. It is impossible to discuss anything intelligently unless those who are in charge of the bill pay attention, and I am seeking to discuss it now——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I am not in charge of it any more than anyone else.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, we are confronted with a very strange situation. We are now considering an important measure, one which vitally deals with the valuable personal and property rights of soldiers, sailors, and marines who have lately done service for their country in the trenches of France.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Why, Mr. Speaker, my colleague yielded to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A point of order is always in order.

Mr. GARD. I yielded to the gentleman from Texas for a question.

Mr. DOWELL. But the gentleman is not propounding a question.

Mr. BLANTON. I have a right to frame my own question.

Mr. GARD. I yielded to the gentleman for a question; I do not desire——

Mr. BLANTON. My question is not going to be very long——

Mr. GARD. Very well.

Mr. BLANTON. As I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, on this very important bill which the distinguished jurist who now has the floor and who kindly yielded to me says is an injustice to men in the service, it is impossible to keep a quorum here, even after the majority leader [Mr. MONDELL] spent 20 minutes in the Republican caucus last night with tears in his eyes pleading with and urging Republican Members to stay on this floor, we have not but 15 Republican Members now on the floor and we can not keep the chairman of the Judiciary Committee here to answer questions. Is that——

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the gentleman to order.

Mr. BLANTON. Is that the kind of business management in this Congress the Republicans are giving to the people of the United States?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to say what I do say in any partisan sense or appeal to any partisan passion at all. I am seeking to make a legal discussion of the bill, and although we do not happen to have very many Members present, yet they make up in quality what they lack in quantity.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will

Mr. HUSTED. Did I correctly understand the gentleman to say that by this bill under consideration, through the filing of an affidavit, we could validate a judgment or that we propose to validate a judgment in which no summons has been issued——

Mr. GARD. I think it might be so.

Mr. HUSTED. I do not see how that can be done, because you provide in terms that it only applies to an action or proceeding commenced in any court. No action can be commenced in any court except by the service of process.

Mr. GARD. An action may be commenced, in so far as it has authority, against the defendant, but——

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. But I desire to suggest—I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. TINCHER. As I understand this act, it is in the nature of a curative act. Is the gentleman of opinion that it cures too many irregularities?

Mr. GARD. I think so; yes.

Mr. TINCHER. It is after irregularities other than that of filing soldiers' affidavits?

Mr. GARD. I should like to discuss the matter and draw attention of Members here to language which I think could be added by way of amendment making the bill a proper bill. There may be cases where some relief of this kind should be had; for that reason I was asking the presence of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, because I think Members of the House are guided largely by chairmen of committees. Since the chairman of the committee is not here, and does not care to stay, I shall offer my observations. [Applause.]

The points that I make are, first, that there should be an amendment, in line 3, page 1, providing that there should appear to have been a proper service——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present. I think that Members ought to hear this argument.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the gentleman will not make that point.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, this is an important matter; Members ought to hear it, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum. I do not think that this House ought to do business without a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Sergeant at Arms will open the doors. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] has the floor.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twelve minutes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, the bill S. 2236, to which I have hitherto vainly tried to claim the attention of the chairman of the committee, provides a practical amendment of section 2 of the so-called act to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war. The purpose of the bill is just that expression:

To afford protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war.

Toward that end certain safeguards were placed in section 2, the principal one of which was that an affidavit should be filed before judgment should be entered, the affidavit setting forth facts showing that the defendant is not in the military service. It provides an alternative that if he is unable to file that affidavit the plaintiff shall in lieu thereof file an affidavit setting forth either that the defendant is in the military service or that the plaintiff is not able to determine whether or not he is in such service, and it provides that if the affidavit is not filed no judgment shall be entered securing an order, the court directing such entry, and no such order shall be made if the defendant is in such service until after the court shall have appointed an attorney to defend his interests, and he shall on application make such a point. In other words, a complete safeguard is sought to be thrown about the interests of those in the military and naval service of the United States in the processes in the courts of civil administration of the United States during the period of the war. The present bill, S. 2236, has this objection, in my mind, and I will offer certain amendments which I trust may be entertained, if the gentleman who is chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary will be so fair to the membership of the House as to ask that the bill may be considered under the five-minute rule after the hour's debate shall have been exhausted.

There may be cases where this bill or a bill similar to this may be proper to afford necessary relief. There may be cases under this bill whereby an absolutely illegal judgment would, by the filing of an affidavit, be validated, and that is the principal point that I seek to protect. I do not desire to disturb in any way the existence of any judgment granted after full service of summons and after proper procedure, but I do object to a case where a judgment otherwise illegal may be rendered entirely legal by the filing of that which may be called a nunc pro tunc affidavit.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEY. What instance can the gentleman cite where an illegal judgment may be made legal or valid?

Mr. GARD. The bill provides in its terms that where no judgment has been entered since March 8, 1918, where there was a failure to file in such action the affidavits required by section 2, that upon the filing of these affidavits the plaintiff may file an affidavit stating the defendant or defendants in default of judgment were not at the time of the filing, or at the time of the entry of the judgment, in the military or naval forces, and therefore the judgment shall stand and be effective as of the date of the entry thereof. What I have in mind is a judgment which a man may not have contested, which a defendant may not have contested, although fully cognizant of his rights, because of illegality, because no proper or necessary affidavit was filed against him, he being in the military service. He relied upon the failure of procedure, in other words.

And otherwise there may have been defects in the procedure. Otherwise the judgment may be erroneous. Still, if he does not act and relies on the failure of the affidavit procedure, then upon the passage of this bill and the filing of this affidavit what may be a valid judgment may be considered invalid.

Mr. RAMSEY. If the gentleman will permit me, is not an invalid judgment subject to review by the court at any time by application of the defendant? This applies only to men who were not in the military service.

Mr. GARD. This applies for the protection of those who were in the military service.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GARD. Very gladly.

Mr. REAVIS. For the purpose of information, I want to know the gentleman's viewpoint. Invalid judgments are either void or voidable?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. If they are voidable, the remedy is to take it into a court of appeals. If it was a void judgment, it could not be validated by this bill or any other bill?

Mr. GARD. That is what this bill provides.

Mr. REAVIS. You can not cause this bill or any other legislation to put vitality into a judgment that is void?

Mr. GARD. I do not think so.

Mr. REAVIS. Then where would be the danger of the occurrence of what the gentleman fears?

Mr. GARD. I fear that is the underlying purpose of the bill, which may not be correctly expressed in terms, and therefore I desire to offer some amendments which, to my mind, will clarify the situation.

Mr. REAVIS. Assuming the purpose of the bill is to make valid a judgment absolutely void, no legislation can do that.

Mr. GARD. If that be true, if a position is taken that it is to make valid a judgment absolutely void—I do not take that position—but if that is the position taken, there should be no further consideration.

Mr. REAVIS. If no legislation can make valid a void judgment, where would be the danger the gentleman suggests with reference to a voidable judgment where the remedy is the right of repeal?

Mr. GARD. I will state for the benefit of the Members that the remedy I seek is the proper remedy in the procedure which this bill undertakes to remedy. To this bill, Senate No. 2236, concerning which a number of gentlemen have spoken, principally upon the other side, I desire to offer certain amendments covering what seem to me to be questions relative to the proper amendment of the bill. I have no desire to take up very much time on the bill.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I would prefer, if I may be permitted, to advise the membership of the House about what amendments I have in mind, so that they may be discussed, although I am willing to yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman decline to yield?

Mr. GARD. I would prefer for the moment just to explain.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GARD. The amendments I have in mind are, first, on page 1, line 3, of the bill, after the word "judgment," to insert the words "after proper service on the defendant." The second amendment that I have is on page 1, line 10, after the word "plaintiff," to insert the words "after such notice to the defendant as may be prescribed by the court." The third amendment that I have in mind is to insert, after the word "judgment," on line 5 of page 2, the words "if otherwise legal."

I have offered these amendments because if this is to be considered merely as a matter of procedure and not a matter of validating a void judgment, then it would seem to me that especially the amendment I have offered on line 5 of page 2, the words "if otherwise legal," should be placed in the bill. I have offered the amendment on page 1, line 10, that "the plaintiff may file after such notice to the defendant as may be prescribed by the court an affidavit stating that the defendant or defendants," and so forth; in other words, in order to make it comply with the original bill. The purpose of that amendment is to compel a notice of the filing of the affidavit to be given to the defendant in order that the defendant may have the right to rebut it, because if the procedure is to be started entirely de novo, a man who has failed to do something that the statute required him to do and then this law comes in and allows him to do it, we at least should provide, if the affidavit is filed, that notice should be given in order that the defendant may controvert the affidavit.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. In a moment. I have now made known my position on these three amendments, and I yield first to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID].

Mr. KINKAID. Then, it is the purpose of the gentleman that he would require due process of law before permitting a judgment to be entered against the defendant?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. And the gentleman would require that by actual service or constructive service upon the defendant, or upon the thing, whether real estate or otherwise?

Mr. GARD. I think that when this law provides for the filing of the affidavit at a late date, and long after the judgment has been rendered, if the law permits an affidavit to be subsequently filed the defendant should have notice of that filing.

Mr. KINKAID. Another question. Is it the opinion of the gentleman from Ohio that taking judgment without due process of law would be any more valid in this instance provided for by the bill than in the first instance, where there was not the proper foundation for jurisdiction laid?

Mr. GARD. I do not think it would be. I yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], and then I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL].

Mr. SANFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman what may appear to be a very simple question. I think he and the members of his committee can probably answer it. I want to ask him if a member of the draft board is a member of the Military Establishment within the meaning of this law?

Mr. GARD. I confess that the question was never raised in my mind and never brought up in the committee. I would be inclined to think that he would not be.

Mr. SANFORD. I am interested to ask the question because the chairman seems to think this is a very simple matter, and he leaves it with the plaintiff in order to secure such a judgment to file an affidavit wherein the affiant shall decide for himself whether the plaintiff is in the Military or Naval Establishment or not. It seems to me it is a very difficult question to establish sometimes, whether a man is in the Military Establishment or not, and my doubt is strengthened by the failure of the gentleman from Ohio to answer.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] advises me that section 101, which I have in my hand, defines who are in the military service, and it includes the following:

That the "persons in military service," as used in this act, shall include the following persons and no others: All officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, the Regular Army Reserve, the Officers' Reserve Corps, and the Enlisted Reserve Corps; all officers and enlisted men of the National Guard and National Guard Reserve recognized by the Militia Bureau of the War Department; all forces raised under the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917; all officers and enlisted men of the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard; all officers and enlisted men of the Naval Militia, Naval Reserve force, Marine Corps Reserve, and National Naval Volunteers recognized by the Navy Department; all officers of the Public Health Service detailed by the Secretary of the Treasury for duty either with the Army or the Navy; any of the personnel of the Lighthouse Service and of the Coast and Geodetic Survey transferred by the President to the service and jurisdiction of the War Department or of the Navy Department; members of the Nurse Corps; Army field clerks, field clerks, Quartermaster Corps; civilian clerks and employees on duty with the military forces detailed for service abroad in accordance with provisions of existing law; and members of any other body who have heretofore or may hereafter become a part of the military or naval forces of the United States.

Mr. SANFORD. Will it help the gentleman at this time to answer the question by my saying that as I understand it the Secretary of War made an order to the effect that the members of the draft board should be deemed to be in the military service? I was wondering whether under the law they would be brought under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GARD. I do not think they would, not unless there is power given under section 101 for the Secretary to include them in the Military Establishment.

Mr. SANFORD. The purpose of my question was to show that this affidavit, which this plaintiff is privileged to make, gives him an opportunity to decide quite a complicated question for himself, to swear to a fact and get his judgment by a very simple process.

Mr. GARD. It does. It is a very comprehensive affidavit; and that affidavit should be safeguarded by certain regulations to preserve the primary intent of the bill, which was to afford relief to soldiers and sailors against civil processes in their absence.

Mr. SANFORD. Just one word more. For that reason I think there should be notice given, so that the defendant may be heard on that question, at least as to whether he was or was not in the military service.

Mr. GARD. I think he should have notice, so that, if he cares to, he can file a contradictory affidavit and put the question whether he was or was not in the service up to the court to decide. Otherwise the first affidavit is not entirely one of jurisdiction, but this is so nearly one of making a judgment valid that it seems to me the defendant should have the right to file a contradictory affidavit, if he desires, showing that he was in the military service when the plaintiff says he was not.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will yield first to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not the gentleman think adequate protection would be given by his last amendment without including the other?

Mr. GARD. I am frank to say that I think that is the most vital amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I should like to suggest in this connection that service may have been had regularly when the suit was first filed, and the defendant may be somewhere in a far-distant State now, and it would be very difficult to secure service if you adopt the first amendment.

Mr. GARD. I think the first amendment may be unnecessary, and I will not insist upon it. I offered it for the purpose of clarifying the situation in its entirety.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think the last amendment is the more important.

Mr. GARD. The first amendment may not be necessary, but I think the second amendment is a proper amendment, and I think the third amendment is one that by all means ought to be adopted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How much time will have to be exhausted before we get to the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] is entitled to the floor until 8 minutes after 3.

Mr. GARD. I want to yield the floor as soon as gentlemen have concluded their questions.

Mr. BOIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BOIES. Does the gentleman from Ohio hold the opinion that House bill 6361 has reference to anyone not in the service of the United States?

Mr. GARD. What is House bill 6361?

Mr. BOIES. The bill referred to in this bill, Senate bill 2236.

Mr. GARD. Is that the one that is set out in Fortieth Statutes at Large?

Mr. BOIES. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Now, what is the gentleman's question?

Mr. BOIES. Does the gentleman think that law was enacted for the protection of anyone outside of the service of the United States Government?

Mr. GARD. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. BOIES. Then, does the gentleman hold that any affidavit filed at this time could validate a judgment against a soldier in the service of the United States?

Mr. GARD. Not against a soldier; no.

Mr. BOIES. Then, if he is a soldier, the affidavit does not validate the judgment. If he is not a soldier, it has no application, because this law has no reference to anyone outside of the service of the United States.

Mr. GARD. The point I have been trying to make is this, that the filing of the affidavit by the plaintiff himself makes it an absolute conclusion that the defendant is not a soldier. Now, he may be a soldier, and my contention is that at this time especially he should have the privilege of filing a contradictory affidavit, in the event that he was not in the military service, to show what his real status was.

Mr. BOIES. If it is a false affidavit, it is fraudulent, and nothing can be based upon it.

Mr. GARD. That is very true, but unless its falsity is made known it can operate as a continuation of the validity of the judgment. If the gentleman will investigate the bill, he will find that it merely provides that any person who uses an affidavit knowing it to be false is guilty of a misdemeanor, but it nowhere says that the affidavit must be true or that the judgment must be based upon a true affidavit. In other words, under this bill a man could come in and file an affidavit that is not true and sustain the validity of his judgment heretofore obtained, and would be liable only under a criminal process, and by an untrue affidavit he could establish the validity of his judgment.

Mr. BOIES. Then why would it not be cured by a short amendment saying that whenever it appears that the affidavit is false it shall have no validity?

Mr. GARD. I hardly think that is necessary.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield to my colleague from Ohio, and then I shall be glad to yield the floor.

Mr. KEARNS. It has been necessary to file this affidavit in all suits that have been brought since March 18, 1918. Is that correct?

Mr. GARD. Since the passage of the bill; yes, in all cases.

Mr. KEARNS. Suppose a suit had been brought and there was no affidavit filed, but the defendant appeared in court and was present and defended the suit.

Mr. GARD. Then this has no application.

Mr. KEARNS. Then it is not necessary to file an affidavit at this time?

Mr. GARD. No.

Mr. KEARNS. Then it will be necessary to file affidavits in order to validate judgments that have already been rendered only in cases where there was nonappearance of the defendant?

Mr. GARD. Nonappearance and default; that is all.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. If this bill has any flaw in it at all, it is in lines 5 and 6, where it is sought to make the judgment final. That is the big mistake in the bill, and I think we should insert, in line 6, after the word "thereof," the words "subject, however, to the usual writ of error or appeal." With that amendment we would have a fairly good bill.

Mr. GARD. On what page is that?

Mr. JUUL. Page 2. You will notice in line 3 it says:

And upon the filing of such affidavit the court may enter an order that such judgment shall stand and be effective as of the date of the entry thereof.

Now, no matter what judgment may be entered up against a man, he ought to have the right of appeal.

Mr. GARD. It does not say the judgment is final. I think it includes the subsequent recognized procedure.

Mr. JUUL. It does not say that. It says:

Such judgment shall stand and be effective.

If it should stand, it should stand subject to the usual right of appeal or writ of error to which any other judgment would be subject.

Mr. GARD. My opinion is that such is the case anyhow.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MADDEN). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I submit that under the rules of the House the bill should be read under the five-minute rule, debate having been exhausted and the gentleman having used his part of the hour and yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is on the House Calendar and does not come under the five-minute rule. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now read for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the bill be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That where any judgment has been entered since March 8, 1918, in any action or proceeding commenced in any court where there was a failure to file in such action the affidavits required by section 200 of article 2 of the act approved March 8, 1918, entitled "An act to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war" (40 Stat. L., p. 440), the plaintiff may file an affidavit stating that the defendant, or defendants, in default in such judgments, are not at the time of such filing, and were not at the time of the entry of such judgment, in the naval or military service of the United States, and upon the filing of such affidavit the court may enter an order that such judgment shall stand and be effective as of the date of the entry thereof. Any person who shall make or use such an affidavit as aforesaid, knowing it to be false, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punishable by imprisonment not to exceed one year or by fine not to exceed $1,000, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, in line 10, after the word "plaintiff."

Mr. GARD. I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I am offering my amendments at this time, and then the gentleman can offer his afterwards. I move to amend, on page 1, line 10, after the word "plaintiff," by inserting the words "after such notice as the court may prescribe."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "plaintiff," insert the words "after such notice as the court may prescribe."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Now, on page 2, line 6, strike out the word "thereof" and insert the words "of such judgment as if such affidavit had been duly filed."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, strike out the word "thereof" and insert "of such judgment as if such affidavit had been duly filed."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. On page 2, line 9, strike out the words "one year" and insert the words "two years."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out the words "one year" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two years."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. In line 10 strike out "$1,000" and insert "$5,000." I am trying to harmonize this with the law in regard to perjury.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I have one other amendment. In line 8, page 2, strike out the words "guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, strike out the words "guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOWELL. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that the words "shall be" ought not to be stricken out.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; it is in there twice. It now reads "it shall be punishable." It is not necessary to specify that it is a misdemeanor.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I have sent to the Clerk's desk three amendments. The second amendment has been offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, and I do not desire to insist on the first amendment that I have offered, and I ask to withdraw it. But I do offer the third amendment, which I will ask the Clerk to report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "judgment," insert "if otherwise legal."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I think that is clearly covered by the amendment I offered, because it is only valid now as if the affidavit had been filed. The amendment I offer takes care of that very proposition.

Mr. GARD. I do not think it does; I think my amendment carries out the original intention of the act, which was the protection of the soldiers and sailors.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is plain that this does not intend to validate anything else.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a consideration of my amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. I want to say that a judgment entered is presumed to be legal. It is a presumption of law. Why should we put in language which might bring it into investigation?

Mr. GARD. It is for the protection of the soldiers and the sailors, which is the object of the original bill; otherwise there would be no need of the legislation.

Mr. RAMSEY. The object of this bill is to protect the man who is not a sailor or a soldier.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman from New Jersey does not mean to say that a judgment is conclusive?

Mr. RAMSEY. No; but it is presumptively legal.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Suppose a judgment was entered without any citation. Under this bill, without that amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, it would be legalized by filing an affidavit.

Mr. RAMSEY. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES of Texas. According to its terms, it would.

Mr. RAMSEY. Oh, no. A judgment is presumed to be legal when entered, and any man has a right to make application to a court to open it and show that it is not legal.

Mr. JONES of Texas. But this law would go ahead and say that it shall be corrected at that time.

Mr. RAMSEY. The judgment stands the same as it was before.

Mr. McPHERSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if this entire act which we are considering and the report that accompanies it does not show that we are not dealing with a legal proceeding against soldiers or sailors?

Mr. RAMSEY. That is true.

Mr. McPHERSON. What authority has Congress to pass an act affecting the judgment of a State court under this act or any other act that is not a proceeding between some person as plaintiff against some person as defendant who was in the military service?

Mr. RAMSEY. We are not affecting that. Congress has passed a law that before any judgment could be entered against any person, where it was by default, in order to protect possibly the soldier or the sailor, the plaintiff must file an affidavit that the defendant is not either a soldier or a sailor. For instance, the gentleman is my next-door neighbor and I sue him for $5,000. He admits the claim. He is not in the military service. He says that he has no defense and that I may take judgment by default, and because I have not filed this affidavit, therefore some one may come in and say that that is an illegal judgment. Of course, my conclusion is that upon a fair, honorable, judicial decision every court would construe it and say that it is a good judgment, but there may be a question about it. Therefore in order to make effective and without question a judgment entered by me against the gentleman who is not in the service we want to pass this law to eliminate any possible question in the future.

Mr. McPHERSON. One further question. At the time Congress passed the act that is being amended, it was exercising a war power for carrying on the war.

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes.

Mr. McPHERSON. And the gentleman will admit that they had authority to regulate the legality of a legal proceeding in the State court only as against a soldier.

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes.

Mr. McPHERSON. In case he assumes judgment was entered, but it was not a matter between a soldier and some one else.

Mr. RAMSEY. That is what this bill is for.

Mr. McPHERSON. And there was no one connected with the proceeding over which Congress had any jurisdiction.

Mr. RAMSEY. No.

Mr. McPHERSON. So that we are regulating a judgment outside of our jurisdiction.

Mr. RAMSEY. We are only seeking to perfect a judgment as against a man who is not a soldier.

Mr. McPHERSON. And we have no authority over him.

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, we have. We have placed on the statute books a law which requires an affidavit to be filed stating that the defendant is not a soldier.

Mr. McPHERSON. Does the gentleman mean to say that Congress can require a certain thing to be true or a certain evidence to be introduced in a State court in the absence of a soldier being the defendant?

Mr. RAMSEY. Oh, that is a constitutional question, and I am not passing upon that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Suit is filed on the supposition that a man is not a soldier and no affidavit is required. Suppose, as a matter of fact, a man is a soldier fighting for his country in the trenches of France.

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Under this bill as originally brought in here, without amendment, the plaintiff, if he saw fit—and people in court do frequently cross each other in testimony, sometimes on very material matters—by merely filing an affidavit that the defendant was not in the service of the country when the suit was filed could get his judgment validated under this proposed law. The question I desire to ask is, Does the gentleman believe that the courts of this country would hold that this kind of law would validate such a judgment?

Mr. RAMSEY. No; and in reply I want to say this: Of course the judgment would not be validated, and the man who made the affidavit would go to State prison for two years and be fined $5,000. The presumption, as I understand it, is that men are honest, honorable, truthful, and that they make affidavits according to facts. We do not pass our legislation nor do we draw our conclusions upon the idea that men are false.

Mr. BLANTON. But the existing law was intended only to apply to soldiers, sailors, and marines in the service of their country.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am frank to answer the question by saying this, that a proper judicial construction of the law as originally passed would show that any judgment entered as against a man who was not a soldier would not require the affidavit for the reason that the original law was passed for the purpose of protecting the soldier and the sailor, and when you come to construe a law you must construe it according to the purpose for which it was passed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not do that. I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I withhold the motion for the present.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Would it not be first proper to vote upon the amendment that I have offered, which is pending?

The SPEAKER. If there is an amendment pending, yes. The previous question can be ordered upon that, however. The Chair understands the gentleman to withdraw his motion for the previous question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I withhold the motion for the present.

The SPEAKER. If there is an amendment pending, the Chair will put the question on the amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 2, line 5, after the word "judgment," insert "if otherwise legal."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 37, noes 28.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN: Amend the bill, on line 10, page 1, after the figures "440," by striking out all thereafter down to and including the word "thereof," in line 6, on page 2, and inserting the following: "Such judgments shall be valid notwithstanding the failure to file the affidavit required aforesaid: Provided, That any defendant in any such suits filed or judgments rendered at any time before the collection of any such judgment shall have the right to appear in any such court and establish the fact, if such is the fact, that such defendant was a member of the Military or Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war and included within the said act approved March 8, 1918, whereupon such cases or case shall be tried de novo."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, from all I can understand from the facts surrounding this legislation perhaps thousands, maybe tens of thousands, of suits have been brought between civilian citizens of the United States as plaintiff and defendant, or in which judgments have been rendered and in which affidavits have not been filed, and therefore these judgments may be voided or may be voidable, or they may not, but in order to settle that question I think the simplest way to validate all such judgments is to give any defendant who may have been in the military or naval service the right to appear in such court and establish the fact that he was in the military or naval service, coming within the exception, and when the judgment is set aside start out de novo.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. The purpose of the law originally was that he should not be compelled to appear in court during his service.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Surely.

Mr. DOWELL. Now, the gentleman's amendment compels him to appear in court and set aside a judgment rendered while in actual service.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It gives him a trial de novo after he leaves the service

Mr. DOWELL. I understand; but should not we continue to treat him as in the original act, by requiring plaintiff to show that he was not in the service?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The only objection to the gentleman's position is, on the one hand we may have hundreds of thousands of judgments rendered between civilians in the United States and subject every one of them to the filing of additional affidavits and to the sending out of additional citations for men who were absolutely not in the military service, who may be their neighbors, who appeared in court and fought their cases and final judgment was rendered, who were not connected in any way with the military service, and yet they had not filed affidavits to show that in such cases.

Mr. DOWELL. But he must appear; we are now only correcting the error of attorneys in filing the original proceedings.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Sure; we are correcting them.

Mr. DOWELL. It would seem to me we would be doing better if we required the plaintiffs to file affidavits than to place the burden of proof upon the soldier who is actually in the service who has judgment rendered against him.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But you may not have a hundred soldiers out of the entire military service of the United States who have judgments rendered against them.

Mr. DOWELL. So far as I am concerned, I am in favor of protecting that hundred under the original law.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman's amendment provides that this affidavit is filed before collection of judgment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. There is no affidavit. I strike out the affidavit. It provides that any time before the collection of judgment the soldier, if he is a soldier and can make a showing to the court that he is a soldier, should have the judgment set aside.

Mr. KEARNS. The point I want to make is this: Suppose it is a case where there is no money or property collection to be made.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, an enforcement of the judgment.

Mr. KEARNS. Then the gentleman's amendment will have to be amended. It might be a foreclosure or it might be a divorce suit.

Mr. BUCHANAN. A foreclosure would be a collection.

Mr. KEARNS. It might be a divorce suit.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask that that word "enforcement" be put in instead of "collection."

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will.

Mr. McPHERSON. I take it the gentleman has examined the law that we are amending. I have it here, and this is the provision of section 4:

If any judgment shall be rendered in any action or proceeding governed by this section against any person in the military service during the period of such service or within 30 days thereafter, and it appears that such person was prejudiced by reason of his military service in making his defense thereto, such judgment may, upon application, made by such person or his legal representative not later than 90 days after the termination of such service, be opened by the court rendering the same, and such defendant or his legal representative let in to defend.

So that the gentleman's amendment is already in the law. Your amendment is already in the law, is it not?

Mr. BUCHANAN. My amendment gives a man unlimited time. He may not know of it until the 90 days has elapsed under the law as it now stands, but under my amendment he will have until judgment is collected or some attempt to be enforced, and no possible injustice can be done the soldier. On the other hand, it will save perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars to the civilian litigants of this country in court costs, attorneys' fees, and so forth.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word in opposition to the amendment. If I understand it rightly, instead of correcting the error made by the plaintiff originally in the filing of the suit in his failure to comply with the law enacted to protect soldiers and sailors in the service, this amendment, if adopted, without notice would compel the soldier or sailor to appear in court and file an affidavit or make a showing that he was in the service at the time of the entering of the judgment.

Now, it seems to me that all the protection we threw around the soldier while he was in the service we are now taking off if we adopt this amendment. In other words, wherever a judgment was rendered against a soldier, even in violation of the statutes, by this amendment the judgment is valid and binding, unless perchance he discovers that a judgment was rendered against him and makes a showing before the court. I can see no reason whatever why we should place such a burden upon one who has a judgment rendered against him unlawfully where the attorneys for the plaintiff fail to comply with the statute. I think the amendment should be voted down.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. I will.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. And if this judgment has been collected or enforced the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas would be to validate it?

Mr. DOWELL. And it stands a valid judgment until he has appeared in court and set it aside. In other words, by the adoption of this amendment we invalidate the law that was enacted for his protection while he was in the service.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to express myself to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. The amendment I desired to offer was the same in principle as the one now pending, and therefore I will not offer mine.

I think in dealing with this pure question of law we ought to deal with it devoid of sentimentality so far as it is possible to do it. In the last three years the sensibilities, and enthusiasms, and affections, and loyalty of the American people have been so wrought up that to mention a soldier's name is calculated to cause something akin to delirium tremens—and that is about the only way we will ever have this fatal disease here.

This bill would have no place on the calendar, and ought not to consume a half day's time of the House of Representatives, if it were not for the fact that a great many suits have been brought throughout the land in which litigants failed to file a formal affidavit, say, like a suit of Smith against Jones, two old sinners that everybody knew were too old to fight, and probably would not fight if they could; and therefore this formal statutory affidavit was not made. It may be that those suits run into hundreds of thousands. Now, this statute is attempted to cure the defect in that judgment. It is to clarify the statute, and to cure it. How? By requiring the plaintiff in each one of these hundreds of thousands of lawsuits possibly, in the circuit courts and in the lower courts, to go and file a purely formal affidavit. A merchant who had to resort to the law to collect his bills and brought suit against 25 or 50 of his patrons must file 25 or 50 affidavits that those men were not in the military service.

A gentleman says, "Suppose a soldier boy's land had been sold." Let me say to you that no soldier boy who had land in the United States has lost 1 foot of it while he was following the flag. I do not believe there is a community in this whole land of ours where public sentiment would permit a claim to go into court and obtain judgment against a soldier fighting for his country, and sell his land. I do not believe such a thing has been done or would be done. It is true that it is said that lawyers and courts did not know about this statute. I will tell you what they did know. Every man, woman, and child in this country knew that Congress had provided that the soldier boy, while fighting for his native land, should not be sued in court. They knew that. Hence they have not been sued. You give notice, and I believe the amendment carries it, to the defendant. What does that mean? There are 100,000 cases, and to give notice under the statutes of the United States and statutes of every State in the United States means it must be served by some authorized officer or somebody who will make an affidavit to the service, and sheriff's fees, and the constable's fees, and docketing fees, and notary's fees, and a whole lot of costs multiplied and added, and for what purpose? Because some one fancies that somewhere some soldier boy might be injured. I do not believe that. Adopt this amendment, and I think you will save a great deal of trouble and make this law a reasonable provision, such as it ought to be.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be now closed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be now closed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 18.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Obviously there is no quorum present.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, may the bill be read with amendments?

The SPEAKER. That is not in order after the point of no quorum is made. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 183, nays 63, answered "present" 1, not voting 183, as follows:

On motion of Mr. VOLSTEAD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WOMAN-SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the secretary of state of the State of Montana announcing the ratification by the legislature of that State of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE IN FEDERAL COURTS.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 3171.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, calls up the bill H. R. 3171, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3171) to amend the practice and procedure in Federal courts, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter in any cause pending in any United States court, triable by jury, in which the jury has been impaneled to try the issue of facts, it shall be reversible error for the judge presiding in said court to express his personal opinion as to the credibility of witnesses or the weight of testimony involved in said issue: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the court directing a verdict when the same may be required or permitted as a matter of law.

SEC. 2. That the judge of the court on the issue of law involved in said cause shall be required to deliver his charge to the jury after the introduction of testimony and before the argument of counsel on either side, and where requested by either party said charge shall be reduced to writing: Provided, however, That in United States courts sitting in States in which the law permits the trial judge to deliver his charge after argument of counsel, such procedure and practice may be followed by the trial judges in United States courts sitting in such States.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I would like, if possible, to arrange for general debate on this bill if anyone desires to oppose it.

The SPEAKER. The rule allows one hour to each side.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] cares to speak, I will yield to him 15 minutes now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I do not mean to occupy the floor for the 15 minutes yielded me by the gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee. There is nothing I can say about the proposed measure that is not expressed in the bill itself. Every gentleman here who has practiced in the Federal courts realizes the importance of the passage of this proposed act.

It seeks to make the practice and procedure in the Federal courts the same as in the State courts in the site where the court may sit, with this one exception: Heretofore in all the States, so far as my acquaintance with the practice in the Federal courts goes, the Federal judges have assumed to "sum up," as they call it, intermingling their statement of fact and the law, and after argument of counsel. This bill requires that in those States where that practice does not prevail the Federal judge shall render his charge to the jury after the introduction of all of the evidence and before argument of counsel. It goes this much further: It provides that at the request of either party the charge of the judge shall be in writing.

The proviso in section 2 says: "That in United States courts sitting in States in which the law permits the trial judge to deliver his charge after argument of counsel, such procedure and practice may be followed by the trial judges in United States courts sitting in such States." The only change would be in requiring him, at the suggestion of either party, to deliver his charge in writing.

I do not, of course, know what the procedure in United States courts is in all the States. But I know this is the procedure in my State and other States where I have had occasion to go: The judge reserves his charge until after the arguments of counsel. He then frequently in his charge expresses his personal opinion as to the credibility of witnesses and the weight of testimony. I recall one of the most sensational trials that ever took place in our section of the country, which is reported in Smith against United States (157 Fed., 721). This was a peonage charge. There was but one witness who testified whose testimony, if believed, would have made the conviction of the defendant impossible. The court took occasion to say to the jury, as to this man who testified to that state of facts, that this witness lied and that the jury knew he lied. The court of appeals, in passing upon that, said, admitting it was a bad practice for the trial judge to single out a witness and denounce him as a perjurer—I am not using the exact language of the court but the substance—but inasmuch as he—the trial judge—said somewhere in his charge that the jury was the sole judge of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence, therefore this conduct of the trial judge was not prejudicial.

I have frequently heard, and I presume most gentlemen in this House who have practiced in a United States court have heard the trial judge say to the jury, "Certain witnesses have testified to an alleged state of facts, but no one should be expected to believe them." Of course, somewhere in his charge the trial judge would say, "Notwithstanding the fact that I know and you know the statement of such witness is unreasonable, yet if you are so inclined as to believe him you can render your verdict on his testimony," and this has been held not to be reversible error. This bill says that the trial judge shall express no opinion as to the credibility of a witness or the weight of testimony. In order to protect judges who have gone outside of what seems to be the proper course, the appellate courts have said that such statements of the trial judge are cured by a statement that the jury may believe the witness if it wants to do so, notwithstanding the trial judge has said his testimony is unworthy of belief. It is so held because somewhere he tells the jury they are the sole judges of the weight of testimony and the credibility of witnesses. In other words, the appellate courts have held that the statement of the trial judge that he does not believe a witness and that no sane man could believe him does not and should not influence the jury. If it does not and is not intended to influence unduly the jury—substituting the opinion of the judge for that of the jury—why should and why does the trial judge indulge in such expression of opinion?

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. I have read the provisions of the bill, and I can see nothing seriously wrong with them, except that I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the words in lines 2 and 3, on page 2, where it says:

And where requested by either party said charge shall be reduced to writing——

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. It does not say when the charge is to be reduced to writing. I can easily see where a trial judge may be ready to deliver his charge, but he would like to look up certain authorities before he delivers the charge. Now, when must he reduce his charge to writing?

Mr. CARAWAY. Before he delivers it.

Mr. ROSE. That may cause great delay in the trial of cases, may it not?

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not think so. I do not think the judge ought to charge the jury until he knows what the law is, and this undertakes to say that he shall know and shall reduce it to writing. All of us have suffered by the trial judge so intermingling his statement of facts and his comments upon the testimony with his declarations of law that frequently the ablest lawyer who sits in the court room can not say when the court is making a declaration of law and when he is commenting upon the testimony. This bill undertakes to say that he shall reduce his charge to writing. That is the practice, I think, in about nine-tenths of the States of this Union. It is the practice in my own State, and it works admirably. When counsel argue the case before the jury, he knows exactly what the judge's charge is. It has been reduced to writing. No great delay is caused. After all, however, it is better a little delay than a miscarriage of justice.

Mr. KEARNS. There is nothing in the gentleman's bill that would compel the court to read his charge to the jury before the argument.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; there is.

Mr. KEARNS. I do not so understand it.

Mr. CARAWAY. In section 2 it is provided that the judge of the court shall be required to deliver his charge to the jury after the introduction of all of the evidence and before argument of counsel.

Mr. KEARNS. Yes; but it says:

Provided, however, That in United States courts sitting in States in which the law permits the trial judge to deliver his charge after argument of counsel, such procedure and practice may be followed by the trial judges in United States courts sitting in such States.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; in those States.

Mr. KEARNS. So there is nothing to compel the judge to read his charge to the jury before the arguments of counsel?

Mr. CARAWAY. In States where the State practice and procedure require the court to read his charge before the argument, then the trial judge in the United States court would have to follow the State procedure.

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. But in those States where the old common law rule prevails, and permits the judge to sum up, as it is called, after the argument, the same practice would prevail in the Federal courts.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. Is it the purpose of this bill to prevent the trial judge from stating to the jury the legal rules for determining the credibility of witnesses?

Mr. CARAWAY. No.

Mr. SANFORD. Or the rules by which they shall determine the weight of the evidence?

Mr. CARAWAY. No.

Mr. SANFORD. Does not the gentleman think his bill is a little vague on that subject?

Mr. CARAWAY. No. The only thing this bill undertakes to do is to prevent the judge expressing his personal opinion as to the credibility of a witness or as to the weight of the testimony. There is nothing in the bill to prevent the judge from saying to the jury that the plaintiff must establish his case by a preponderance of testimony, and that in determining the weight of testimony the jury shall give consideration to the interest of the witnesses and to their opportunity to know the facts, and all those things commonly laid down in the rules by which the jury shall be governed in determining the weight of testimony and the credibility of witnesses. There is nothing that prevents the judge doing that. It simply undertakes to prevent the judge saying, "I do not believe the testimony of that witness," or "I believe on the whole case the testimony of the plaintiff ought to prevail." In other words, prevents the trial judge thrusting on the jury his personal opinion as to what its finding should be.

Mr. SANFORD. I appreciate that that is the purpose and intention of the bill, but I am not so sure that the bill has made it entirely clear.

The gentleman will appreciate the fact that a clever judge in stating the rules for determining the weight of testimony and the credibility of witnesses can create in the minds of the jury any impression he may desire to create without violating the provisions of the bill or the ordinary rules of law.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not think an honest judge would so conduct himself. For dishonest judges we have provided other means of procedure.

Mr. KEARNS. I think this bill lays down the rule of practice that is adopted in most of the States of the Union, does it not?

Mr. CARAWAY. In about nine-tenths of them; yes.

Mr. ALMON. I am very much in favor of section 1 of the bill, and it seems to me that in section 2 it should expressly provide when the request for a written charge should be made. In Alabama the rule is that if you want a written charge you must make your request after the evidence closes and before the argument begins, but is not given to the jury until after the argument of counsel.

Mr. CARAWAY. The idea I had, and I think the requirement of the bill is, that he shall reduce it to writing before he delivers it, and upon the request of either party he must reduce his charge to writing before he delivers it.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. Does not the gentleman think that the law should expressly provide when the request for the written charge should be made?

Mr. CARAWAY. I think that when the judge is ready to charge the jury either party can make the request.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It occurs to me that the criticism of the gentleman from Alabama could be cured beyond question by striking out the words "reduced to" and insert the words "delivered in," so that it would leave it that the written charge should be delivered before the argument of counsel, in accordance with whether it was the practice in that State or not, as provided here.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me say the language of the bill is almost the identical language found in the statutes or in the constitution of a number of States. The courts have always held that the judge then is required, where either party requests, to reduce his instructions to writing and read them to the jury.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will yield.

Mr. SABATH. This bill tends to take away from the judge the power to control the action of the jury, as has been frequently done by some judges?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what it seeks to do.

Mr. SABATH. The bill states that he shall not express his personal opinion as to the credibility of witnesses, or the weight of the evidence involved in the issue, but he can do by indirection that which you prohibit by direction. He can do it by examining the witnesses himself, and he can do it by insinuation conveyed to the jury that he does not believe the witness and that he is a contemptible witness. Does not the gentleman think that it should be so amended that he should not indirectly do what you prohibit his doing directly? Some judges have assumed the power of a czar and believe that they have a right to control the action of jurors and everyone else.

Mr. CARAWAY. We could not possibly get into the record the tone of voice by which the judge might convey his opinion, and I think it would lead to endless confusion if we attempted it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The purpose of having the charge reduced to writing is so as to have a permanent record?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Or is it so that counsel may have the law before them?

Mr. CARAWAY. The idea I had was this: It follows, as I said, the language of the Constitution or the statutes of many States, and its purpose is to prevent any question about what the judge charged the law to be. It also gives counsel no excuse to mistake the court's charge. It is a record of the court's instructions and can not be misunderstood.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would it satisfy the provisions of this bill if a stenographic record was made of the charge delivered by the judge? What I have in mind is the saving of time.

Mr. KEARNS. The suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois is that it would stop the crooked judge, if you can conceive of such a man sitting on the bench, afterwards denying that he charged the jury in any such way.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas five minutes more.

Mr. FISHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. FISHER. I am heartily in favor of the first section of the bill, but I have my doubts whether under the second section it would not be a hardship for the judge to reduce his charge to writing. Is it to be construed that he is to reduce it to writing before he delivers the charge?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. FISHER. A stenographer's report would not answer?

Mr. CARAWAY. It would not answer. Counsel could consent that the judge deliver his charge thus, and that it may be transcribed by the reporter, but this bill does not contemplate that; it requires that he shall reduce the charge to writing and read that written charge, so that there can never be any question about what he said to the jury.

Mr. FISHER. Most Federal judges, at least in my district, carry around a stenographer to take down the charge, and the notes are at the request of any lawyer written out after the judge has rendered the charge. Do I understand that you are to construe this law to mean that he must write it in advance?

Mr. CARAWAY. Absolutely.

Mr. FISHER. Where he has 8 or 10 small bootlegging cases during a day, that would be a great hardship on the Federal judge.

Mr. CARAWAY. I take it that in most cases neither side would request the judge to reduce his charge to writing, but if either does it he must reduce it to writing. If either side feels that he can not permit the judge to wander in a charge and wants it reduced to writing, I think he ought to have that right.

Mr. OLIVER. This bill makes it a reversible error for the judge to express an opinion on the character of the witness or the weight of the testimony, but it fails to make it a reversible error if he refuses to give his charge in writing or deliver it in advance of the argument. Would it not, since you expressly provide in section 1 that it shall be reversible error to do a certain thing, be better to provide that it shall be a reversible error to refuse to do it?

Mr. CARAWAY. The gentleman thinks that is not implied. I think it is. Inasmuch as it is made his absolute duty to reduce his charge to writing and deliver it to the jury in advance of argument, of course it would be a reversible error if he should refuse.

Mr. OLIVER. Does the gentleman construe section 2 as preventing any charge from being given by the judge after the argument in those States where the charge is required to be given before the argument?

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not think so. In a State where the constitution provides that a judge shall charge the jury after the introduction of all of the evidence and before argument, and where requested by either party in writing, the courts have held that if some new issue should arise or if the jury should come back and ask for specific instructions the court has the right to grant the request.

Mr. OLIVER. The part I want to bring out is this: The language of section 2 is that the court, "on the issue of law," shall be required, and so forth. All charges are not necessarily referable to issues of law, as the gentleman is aware, and that is rather a restrictive definition of the charge, it seems to me. Many charges undertake to summarize the testimony. Yet that would not necessarily be a charge upon the issues of law, and that is what I had in mind when I asked whether the language of section 2 would preclude a summarizing of the testimony by the judge after the argument was in.

Mr. CARAWAY. It would prevent him from expressing his personal opinion as to the credibility of the witness or the weight of the evidence; nothing more. He would be permitted to lay down rules for weighing testimony.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, and I ask that the gentleman from Minnesota yield him two minutes more.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HERSEY. I want to know the object of the judge submitting his charge in writing when you have a reporter that takes very word he says.

Mr. CARAWAY. There are two reasons. In the first place, it is very difficult sometimes in a long charge for counsel to determine just what the court has declared the law to be. It is difficult for counsel to preserve his exceptions to the charge if it is not in writing, so that he may have it before him. He is in a better position to know what his rights are and whether or not the court has erred in his declarations of law, and in presenting the case to the jury there is less excuse for him to misstate the court's charge to the jury. There are sufficient reasons, in my judgment.

Mr. LITTLE. You might not have any reporter in a Federal court.

Mr. HERSEY. I can not conceive of such a thing.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman would come along with me, I could show him.

Mr. CARAWAY. There is no law in the Federal statutes for reporters in Federal courts. We have a bill now on the calendar, by Mr. STEELE, making provision for a reporter in United States courts.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is evidently the intention in this bill that this charge of the judge should be reduced to writing before being delivered to the jury.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And yet it has occurred to me that the bill might be so construed as to reduce it to writing at any time, so as to comply with the provisions of the bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. The judge has to deliver his charge to the jury before argument of counsel, and he can not make it except he make it in writing if either side requests it. Therefore there can be no question but that the judge would have to reduce his charge to writing before he gave it. I sincerely hope the bill will become a law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I can not say that I heartily approve of this bill. I perhaps belong to that school which still has faith in the administration of justice in our courts. I feel that in the vast majority of cases the law is properly stated to the jury and the evidence is reviewed within the limits which are permissible to a judge bringing the facts to their attention. Because under certain circumstances there have been violations of this rule, I do not think we are justified in attempting to correct those individual cases by general legislation. However, so far as the bill is concerned I shall vote for its adoption. As originally presented there were objections to be made to the language used. For instance, as I recall the prohibition, it was to the judge expressing an opinion as to the credibility of witnesses. Of course, every lawyer in this House knows that it is the duty of a judge under certain circumstances to express an opinion and to charge the jury upon the question of credibility. Let us suppose a criminal case where a man's chief accuser is an accomplice. The court is bound to charge the jury as to the credit and weight of such testimony. Where there is an overwhelming interest upon the part of some witness the court has the right to call the attention of the jury to that interest as something to be taken into consideration in weighing the testimony of the witness. But this language was adopted, with the approval of my colleagues on the committee:

It shall be reversible error for the judge in said court to express his personal opinion as to the credibility of witnesses—

And so forth.

To that language it seems there ought to be no objection. In other words, this would reach the cases that are complained of where the judge goes outside of his judicial function and expresses his personal opinion against a witness as to his credibility. The opinion expressed is merely the judge's own opinion. That is what is excluded by this section and what is made reversible error.

The proviso appended to this section that nothing therein contained shall prevent the court directing a verdict when the same may be required or permitted as a matter of law saves the section from the objection that perhaps there might be involved in this language the prohibition upon a court to direct a verdict when it is his duty to do so.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Surely.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Is not all error which is prejudicial to a party to a cause ground for reversal in common law?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Is it not a fact that some States in order to avoid grounds for appeal or reversals on technicalities, and so forth, have enacted that only such error shall be ground for reversal that goes to the merits of the case and is prejudicial to the party alleging the error?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Would not the use of the words "reversible error" make it mandatory to reverse the case in which error occurred, whether it was a reversible error or not?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman offers a very correct definition.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Would it not be better to leave out the word "reversible"?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I should think not if you are going to stop this practice or abate the evil to be cured; you ought to make it reversible error, and if the judge after the passage of this law indulges in a thing of that kind it ought to be a reversible error if it is put in the law that he ought not to do it; there ought to be no alternative given, but to cure it by saying, "It is all wrong." He should not escape the consequences of his deliberate violation of the law by having a higher court say, "I know he ought not to have done it, but on the whole case it would not justify us in setting aside the verdict, and there will be no reversal."

Mr. BEE. Otherwise it would be a harmless error.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is exactly the excuse the court has given by saying it is cured somewhere else; is not that true?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. All agree on that. But so far as the second section is concerned, I was going to say, and I may be a little bit boastful, perhaps, in so saying, that I have tried as many cases as any man in the House, and perhaps more, but you will excuse the boast when I say that that is only because I am so much older than you are. My knowledge of the practice of the courts in the East is that this section covers a subject that is unknown to us. The judge charges a jury after the addresses of counsel, and it seems to me to be the most logical place for the charge. We must have some faith in the men who administer justice in our courts, and we must believe that they are there as an umpire to express the law and to call the attention of the jury to the facts in the case so that they may reach a righteous verdict; and having that faith in the court the judges ought not to be hampered by having to prepare their charges in writing before counsel addresses the jury and deliver their charges to the jury. It seems to me as a practitioner—probably it comes from the fact of my habit of being accustomed to the opposite course that that is putting the cart before the horse. The charge ought to follow everything, and ought to state clearly the law and give a résumé of the evidence.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. GARRETT. May I ask the gentleman, if I caught correctly the reading of the bill, does not the proviso take care of that situation? The practice is the same in my State, I will say to the gentleman, that it is in his.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I presented that amendment in committee for the purpose of taking care of it in the States where this is now the practice, and I am going to suggest an amendment to the language of the section so as to make it clearer.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman stated that the charge should logically follow everything else.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The argument of counsel in the case?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman in his experience not many times heard lawyers attempt to argue the law to the jury when the court on the bench knew they were not arguing the law and he was going to charge something else to the jury as the law? Then why should not the attorneys have the benefit of the court's charge in arguing to the jury what the law is and knowing exactly what the court would charge as the law in the case?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Replying to the gentleman's interrogatory, I would say that we generally meet that in this way: If I am arguing a question of law to the jury, I will say, "Subject to what the court may direct on this question, gentlemen, I believe the law to be thus and so"; but there is a remedy, and that remedy is to present your points for charge, by which you pin the court down to answer your legal points, so that he must construe the law in such a way as may enable you to know what it may be.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. Is not the purpose of the charge by the court to the jury to clear up misunderstandings which have arisen during the trial of the cause?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. CRAGO. If the judge would charge the jury, and the attorneys argue the case afterwards, would not the case go to the jury in a more chaotic state than if it goes to the jury just after the judge's charge?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I think so.

Mr. CRAGO. The gentleman has suggested——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. May I have a few minutes more?

Mr. GARD. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Five minutes.

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. CRAGO. As the gentleman has well suggested, the submission of points by opposing counsel allows the court to pass on those points before the case is argued anyhow.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; this point about the charge being reduced to writing—I would like to call attention——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Did the gentleman consider it was necessary, at the top of page 2, to put in that clause "before the argument of counsel on either side"? I had supposed that the court followed the practice in the particular State in that respect. So far as I know, the courts follow the practice of the several States in that respect, and I would think it really would be better to leave that out, so that the court, unless he was following the practice of the State, would put off the charge until the argument of the counsel had been finished.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is true. The Federal court is supposed to follow the practice of the States largely. It is not obliged to do so. Now, the object of this section of the bill is to make it compulsory on the court to follow it in this particular. And that is the reason why this language to which the gentleman has referred has been inserted.

There are two things in this section; first, the period at which the charge is to be delivered, which is before the argument of the counsel, and the other is that it must be reduced to writing.

Now, I have no experience with which to speak with reference to the latter phase of this section, but I am told that in the States where this is the practice and is required by law it leads to a very questionable state of affairs very frequently. In the midst of a trial you require the trial judge to reduce to writing his charge. He is going then to reduce it to the simplest form and will not permit of that expansion of statement that ought to be made for the purpose of clearing the matter to the minds of the jury. I am told that some of the charges simply contain the principles of law, and only covering two or three pages of foolscap, and no summing up and reviewing of the case as it ought to be reviewed. Now, if it leads to such a result as that—and I do not know whether that is correct or not——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a moment there?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; surely.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say that depends entirely on the temperament of the judge.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is what I said.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Some of them are inclined to short charges, but even in Iowa we have the complaint there that some of them make too long constructions of the law, up and down and around, until we do not know where they will land.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. My point is that if you adopt this rule you appeal to the judge that is lazy or to the judge that is timid to make exceedingly brief charges, and only express principles of law, and not do justice to the case.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman suggested that judges sometimes, or generally, he was told, omitted the proper review of the case. As far as my experience goes, of about 32 years, the universal rule in all States where the law is as he suggests is that before he does anything else the judge gives a complete and rounded review of the facts of the case. I do not think it has occurred to the contrary in my experience.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. In just a moment, when I have finished this point.

I cited an instance that is fairly corroborated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN]. Now, the second thing in the requirements of this section is that the judge shall reduce his charge to writing. The other relates to the period of its delivery. In addition to what I have already said I would like to add that there is in the Committee on the Judiciary now a bill providing for the appointment of stenographers in all the Federal courts, and that is what ought to be done. There ought to be stenographers to take down the charge of the court, so that there will be no question as to what it is, and so that it could be readily reproduced, and that without the delay incident to requiring the judge to write it in person, and without the temptation to shorten it in order to escape the labor or escape the fear of reversal. Now, if that bill concerning court stenographers is going to be passed, then we need not pass a provision like this requiring the charge to be reduced to writing—to longhand writing—prior to the argument of counsel, in the midst of the trial, and before the case can be concluded.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I come from Kentucky. In our State the charge is given as provided in this bill, in the State courts; but in the Federal courts they follow the procedure as in the gentleman's State. Now, I doubt if there is a lawyer in general practice in the State of Kentucky who does not favor the giving of the written instructions or charge before the argument. And I can not see how it affects the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as the bill requires the court in his State to still follow the State law. Now, in States where they have the State-court practice with this Federal practice we will have two kinds of procedure, but we would make the procedure in our State and in other States similarly situated uniform. And it would be a good thing for Kentucky, and I think the Kentucky lawyers want it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. May I call attention to the fact that it will not be uniform, because in many States, I assume, they do not require that the charge shall be written by the judge at all. It is not provided in my State, for instance, that the charge shall be written up, and still this would compel it to be written.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I am going to suggest that in line 5 of section 2—and I would ask the attention of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] to that—an amendment be made by inserting the words "or rules of procedure and practice."

Mr. CARAWAY. That is in the proviso?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. How would it read?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. As it reads now it is——

Mr. CARAWAY. I know how it reads now.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. "Courts sitting in States where the law permits." There may be a question raised if simply a rule of court provides it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have no objection to that. What I wanted to preserve was that the Federal courts would be compelled to follow the State procedure.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is what I am aiding you to do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I have made these remarks because I thought it was only fair to present the whole case to the consideration of my colleagues. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, it has been a third of a century since I began the practice of the law. It has been 32 years, I think, since I made my first appearance as a lawyer in the Federal courts. The State in which I have practiced has followed the policy which is required in this bill. The Federal court in that State has followed the practice against which this bill is aimed. So I have had an opportunity to see both methods very much in use. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] has stated that he comes from a State where they use the other method, both in the State courts and in the Federal courts, and he hints that he may be prejudiced in favor of his own system, which is very natural. Anybody who has had the extended and successful experience that my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] has had, would very naturally be somewhat fixed in his ideas about the merits of the practice pursued.

But I think those of us who come from States where the practice is dissimilar in the State courts and in the Federal courts have the advantage of the gentleman in opportunity for estimating the merits of the two methods of practice. Under the practice that he advocates the attorney begins his address to the jury after he knows what the evidence is, but before he knows what the law is. A man might just as well address the jury without knowing what the evidence was as to talk to them without knowing what the law was. It would be just as logical.

In the second case I ever tried in the Federal court the question at issue was whether a letter written by the president of the national bank that I represented was a fraudulent letter or not. Of course, I said it was not, and my opponent said it was a fraud, and that they should win their case on that letter.

Before the case had proceeded far the Federal judge remarked casually, in his frank and open way, that if that letter was not a fraud he did not know what a fraud was. Of course, that had a tendency—a slight tendency—to prejudice the jury against my client, though they could believe the judge did not know, as he did not. I called the president of the biggest bank in the State as a witness, and he swore that that was exactly such a letter as he would have written, whereupon the judge said, "Well, I guess I do not know what a fraud is, then." But he had managed to prejudice the jury by his previous statement, so that 11 of them voted against us, and we had a disagreement of the jury and had to try the case over again. Personally I do not think a judge should testify—even in rebuttal—unless he is sworn. Then another judge came down and sat in the case, and as soon as the evidence was presented he told the jury that the letter was not fraudulent at all; that it was just such a letter as anybody should have written; and that if he had written any other kind it would have been fraudulent. He directed the jury presently to decide in our favor. That was an instance in which no man on earth could tell what to say to the jury until he found out what the court was going to hold as to what the law was.

In those States where the court is required to address the jury before counsel argue the case and is required to write out his instructions to the jury the plaintiff appears and puts in writing his requests for certain instructions to the jury. He states the law of his case. The defendant does the same thing. The court then makes his choice between the two. He can take one of them or the other, or he can take a part of one and a part of the other, or he can disregard both; but if he fails to give any just request as to the law made by either plaintiff or defendant or to cover the point in some way in his charge, then the case is reversed on him, if the point is of any importance.

The minute that I, representing the plaintiff, state to the court what the law is and ask him so to charge, and the court refuses to do it, he gives me ground for a new trial, on a reversal in the court of appeals, if I am beaten, and the same is true of the defendant. This conduces to equity and to a just determination of the case. In a State where the judge does not tell the jury what the law is until after counsel have addressed the jury, no man on earth can tell what the decision of the court may be.

In Federal courts, without stenographers, you can not be sure of what error is instructed. Of course, the instructions should be in permanent form for the record and that the attorneys may read and be guided by them. Every man is entitled to a jury trial, and it is not for a judge to sit on a jury. The sheriff, the marshal, or the bailiff has just as much right to tell the jury which witness should be favored as the judge. A man who butts in on a trial that way is a dangerous man. The duty of the court is to state the law and see it is obeyed. One side may address the jury for an hour, following one line of evidence, and the court may say that that has nothing to do with the case. It is not giving a man an opportunity to have a full day in court. No man has had his full day in court until the opportunity comes to his attorney to present the facts to the jury with a knowledge of what the law is. There is always a dispute between the lawyers on each side as to what the law is, and if the attorney for the plaintiff has an incorrect idea of the law of the case his argument goes into the waste basket and his evidence is of no value, and it is the same for the defendant.

The proper thing is for the lawyer to begin the presentation of his case to the jury with all the law in his hand, written out, stating what it is. The gentleman suggests that it should not be in writing. When a judge begins the preparation of his charge to the jury he takes the requested instructions made by each side, goes to his office with his stenographer, and in a few minutes he has prepared the charge, because he has it all accessible at hand.

On the other hand, if he is a just and industrious judge it will take him as long to get ready the other way and no time will be saved. If he jumps in and delivers a charge without looking up the law he has not done the fair thing. So that it would take just as long one way as the other.

Before any judge can charge a jury he must take a little time with the facts before him to decide what the law is. It takes as long for him to prepare his charge after the argument as it does before. And in this system the attorneys have an opportunity to present to the jury their arguments knowing what the law is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman suggests that he has great confidence in the courts and does not think it is necessary to make this change. So have I, but the courts that follow this procedure are more numerous and they do as well as his courts. If the courts which instruct after the arguments are worthy of confidence so are those which deliver written instructions before counsel address the jury.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that the method the gentleman suggests and which is provided in this bill has the effect of expediting the trial of cases?

Mr. LITTLE. Absolutely. The gentleman's experience on the bench makes him a good witness.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that every judge who has been on the bench any time has copies of his old charges from which he can select a charge that will apply to almost any case he may have before him?

Mr. LITTLE. Piles of them that high, and barrels of them sometimes. The gentleman from Texas was a long time on the bench and knows.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Where has the gentleman seen any such court where the judge has piles of charges?

Mr. LITTLE. Almost every judge in my State has them in his office room, and I have a good many judges' old instructions in my own office. They are always easily accessible from the files.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Is it not a fact that every trial judge where this procedure exists during the progress of the trial is constantly preparing his instructions so far as they will affect the case?

Mr. LITTLE. Precisely.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. And so, at the conclusion of the evidence, he has the complete instructions ready?

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman from Missouri ought to know that is so, for he was on the bench in our State for a number of years, and he has practiced law in Missouri, where the practice is somewhat different, and I hope he will tell the House something about that. As a general proposition, I believe that no man on earth has a right to come to a decision in any case or indicate his judgment until he hears all the evidence. Any judge who, before the evidence is all produced, drops a remark before the jury as to how he stands is not an honest man. No court has a right to form its opinion or impress the jury until the witnesses are all heard.

John Brown was tried for his life in Virginia and condemned. Somebody asked him about the judge. He said, "I never did know which side that little man was on." There must have been an honest judge. [Applause.]

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, like most of the gentlemen in this House, I have a license to practice law and have practiced at the law for some years. In the State of Kentucky the court must charge the jury in writing in all criminal cases and must give all the law in criminal cases before the argument of counsel. In civil cases he must give the charge to the jury in writing if requested by counsel before argument to the jury, and that is the only logical way, in my opinion, to try a lawsuit. If a lawyer argues a case, he ought to know what the law of that particular case is before he argues it, so that he can apply the facts to the law. If the charge is not given before he makes his argument, he frequently guesses at what the court will charge the jury and generally takes a crack at the sky and very often misses it. I remember one time being in San Antonio, Tex., when my friend Mr. BEE was district attorney at that place. They have this method—or did then in Texas—of a judge charging the jury after the argument had been closed. A civil case was on trial. One of the lawyers argued that such and such was the law, and another lawyer for the other side argued that something else was the law. The court instructed the jury entirely different from what either one of them had contended. If the court had instructed the jury before the argument of counsel, his instruction, whether the law was correct or not, would have been the law of that particular case until reversed by a higher court, and the attorneys arguing the case would have been confined to those instructions as the law of that case and could have properly applied the facts. That is the method of practice in the State of Kentucky, and I will venture that there is not a lawyer in the State from the Big Sandy to Mills Point who would be willing to adopt a different kind of practice. It is the logical practice and it is the proper practice. I never had any patience with the court making a speech to a jury for his side of the case, and that is what courts frequently do. I do not think the law ought to permit any court to instruct upon the facts.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman to give me a little more time.

Mr. GARD. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Twenty-two minutes.

Mr. GARD. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I think the court ought to give the law as he conceives it to be, and the jury should be the sole judges of the facts, and they should determine what the facts are, not from what the court says but from the testimony of the witnesses and the law as applied to the testimony. If the court has the right to say what the facts are, why should we have a jury, or of what use and what purpose is a jury, if it is to sit there and decide the facts of a case as the court in summarizing it states the facts to be. You might just as well repeal the jury system. The instructions to a jury should give all of the law applicable to the case on trial and in the shortest and simplest form. That, in my opinion, is the most conducive to justice. I have heard of Federal judges in summarizing the testimony absolutely denounce witnesses before juries as being liars. I understand there is one in the State of Arkansas who makes a practice of doing that thing; and any Federal judge who is guilty of such a thing is not fit to try an animal, much less a human being, and he ought to be impeached, I do not care who he is. The object of courts is, or ought to be, to give justice in all cases, and whenever a judge goes to summarizing testimony I think that he is liable to be subject to the same kind of weakness of human nature that affects us all, and that is, in the summary he may favor the side that he honestly thinks ought to prevail. If this bill is passed, the testimony will be heard and the court will have to give its instructions in writing without giving instructions as to how the case should be decided, and then the jury should take his instructions as the law of the case and apply that as best they can to the testimony of the witnesses and decide the case accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I have been watching the clock very carefully while the gentleman from Kentucky has been speaking, and he has been cut off one minute of his time.

Mr. THOMAS. I will grant that minute to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KING. I do not want it, but I was speaking for the gentleman.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, if there is any confusion about the time, I shall be glad to accept the minute remaining. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I am very heartily in favor of the bill as drawn and interpreted by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], who introduced it. I am doubtful, however, as to whether section 2 as drawn carries out the purposes he announces, and I have therefore prepared two amendments, both of which are intended to make effective the interpretation given by the gentleman from Arkansas. I think the House evidently favors the interpretation which he gave the bill. In section 2 it is provided that the charge of the court on the issue of law shall be delivered in advance of the argument in those States where such practice prevails.

The language of section 2 might be construed as simply requiring the charge of the court on mere abstract questions of law to be given in advance of the argument and might permit the court to summarize the evidence by way of charge after the conclusion of the argument. I have prepared an amendment requiring the charge on issues of law and fact to be given in advance of the argument. On page 2 the language is perhaps doubtful, in that it does not require that the charge, when requested in writing, shall be reduced to writing before its delivery. Evidently that is the purpose of the bill. Some of the committee, however, have thought that a compliance with this requirement of section 2 would be met where a stenographer took down the charge and afterwards transcribed and submitted it to the attorneys.

Mr. GARRETT. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not the customary language as is contained in various State constitutions and State statutes? Is not this language in the exact form it is in many States, and has it not been construed always to mean that it should be in advance?

Mr. OLIVER. I will state this to the gentleman: That some members of the committee are not in favor of that construction and feel that the requirement is met by taking contemporaneous stenographic notes to be later transcribed.

Mr. GARRETT. I do not think that is the construction in any State.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not familiar, of course, with the construction in all of the States——

Mr. GARRETT. Of course, I am not, either.

Mr. OLIVER. For your information I will say that attorneys from some Western States inform me that it is a sufficient compliance for the stenographer to take down the charge. I have therefore prepared an amendment for insertion after the word "charge," in line 1, on page 2, the words "before delivery." I yield back what time there may be remaining.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. On page 2 the bill provides that at the request of either party the judge shall give instructions in writing. There is no provision, however, in the bill as to the time when this request may be made. Does not the gentleman believe that there should be a time when these requests should be offered?

Mr. OLIVER. I think it would expedite the trial if you required that at some period of the trial in advance of the argument that such demand be made.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER: Page 1, line 11, after the word "law," insert the words "and fact."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the Speaker permit me to ask a question? I think the word "issue" there should be "issues" of law and fact, and I move that that be amended so as to make the word "issues."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Has there been any suggestion that we are proceeding under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. No; but amendments may be offered without the House proceeding under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GARD. I thought the gentleman was going to make that suggestion.

Mr. OLIVER. I thought the amendment was carried.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, after the third word, "the," strike out the word "issue" and insert the word "issues."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, was the other amendment declared carried?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. GARRETT. I expected to ask a division on that.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. GARD. I have an amendment to offer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 1, line 11, after the word "court," insert "upon request of either party."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, so that the committee may have an intelligent idea of what they are acting upon, I merely beg leave to say that I think, in section 2, where it provides that the issue of law shall be charged by the court before argument of counsel, it should be at least limited to the request by either party, and I have coupled with this amendment which so provides an amendment striking out the language in line 2, page 2, after the word "side," all of the language in line 3 which requires a judge to reduce his charge to writing.

In other words, it makes this state of affairs under section 2: It provides that where there are to be requests the judge on the issues of law shall be required to charge the jury before the argument of counsel, and strikes out that proviso requiring the court to stop as long as is absolutely necessary to reduce his entire charge to writing. I do not desire to pursue the argument any further. I request a vote after the committee understands it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the first amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] was passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to reconsider the vote by which the first amendment of the gentleman from Alabama was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I will state this, that I have no objection to its being reconsidered. If they think it gives to section 2 a different interpretation than that announced by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], I have no desire to offer it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The question was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. May we have the amendment reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER: Page 1, line 11, after the word "law," at the end of the line, insert the words "and fact."

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a substitute to that amendment. Am I in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is in order.

Mr. BRAND. As a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], I move to amend as follows:

After the word "issues," add the following words in section 2, line 11: "raised by the pleadings and evidence involved in said cause."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRAND: Page 1, line 11, after the word "issues," insert: "raised by the pleadings and evidence."

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment? The court instructs upon any other matter without the pleading and evidence.

Mr. BRAND. This section confines it to the law.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. It does not seem possible to do business in this way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SANFORD. I will reserve it for the present, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia as a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Speaker, have I the right to a minute or two?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] has the floor. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, asks for recognition. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by adding, in line 1, page 2, after the word "of," the words "all the."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "of," insert the words "all the."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield a moment? Would it not be better, after the words "all the," to write the word "evidence" instead of "testimony"?

Mr. DOWELL. I did not want to change the language of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. May we not have the bill reported as it is proposed to be amended?

Mr. DOWELL. This is the way it will read:

That the judge of the court on the issues of law involved in said cause shall be required to deliver the charge to the jury after the introduction of all the testimony.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. DOWELL. I yield.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. As I understand it, the testimony is that evidence which is introduced under oath. Evidence may be documentary or testimony under oath.

Mr. DOWELL. I am willing to accept an amendment to strike out "testimony" and insert "evidence," and by unanimous consent I will so amend the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers a modified amendment, which he will please state to the Clerk.

Mr. DOWELL. To read, "of all the evidence."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I move to amend on line 5, after the word "law," on page 2, by insisting "or procedure and practice."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOLSTEAD: Page 2, line 5, after the word "law," insert "or procedure and practice."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. On line 6, after the word "counsel," on page 2, insert "or without such charge being written," so as to make it conform in all the States.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOLSTEAD: Page 2, line 6, after the word "counsel," insert "or without such charge being written."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Page 2, line 7, strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, strike out the word "may" and in lieu thereof insert the word "shall."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. VOLSTEAD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OVER FROM FRIDAY UNTIL TUESDAY NEXT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns Friday it adjourn until Tuesday next. Monday is Labor Day, and quite a number of Members have invitations to speak on that day, and some of them require considerable time to go and come.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Friday it adjourn until Tuesday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order previously made, until to-morrow, Thursday, August 28, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

WAR RISK INSURANCE BUREAU.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, yesterday morning the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] submitted a resolution requesting an investigation of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. I asked that it might go over until to-day that I might ascertain whether a like investigation is being conducted by the House. I do not understand that the House is making such an investigation, but, on the other hand, the two committees on the order of business in discussing the matter of such an investigation some time ago decided that it might well be left with the Senate committee, because there had already been considerable testimony taken by it. I did not understand that there was any objection to the resolution yesterday, and with the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who has the floor on the unfinished business, I ask that the resolution may be brought up and agreed to, if there is no objection to it and no discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that the Finance Committee appointed a subcommittee of that committee for the consideration of the questions involved in the resolution, and just as soon as the leasing bill is out of the way, as chairman of that subcommittee, I intend to take up the question and hope to report to the Senate before very long just what necessary legislation should be enacted.

Mr. MCCUMBER. If the Senator from Utah will request that the resolution be read at the desk, possibly he will find in the resolution Senate authority for action on the part of the committee independent of the committee's own action, and possibly it might cover a little wider scope than is the intendment in the matter before the committee at the present time.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Finance Committee be, and hereby is, directed to investigate the operation and administration of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, providing insurance and compensation for persons disabled in the naval and military service of the United States, and to report such legislation as may be necessary to secure greater equality and justice in the payments and compensation under such act to persons who have been disabled in such naval and military service.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill S. 2236, relating to affidavits required by the act entitled "An act to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war," with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 3171) to amend the practice and procedure in Federal courts, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there is being pressed before Congress a bill called the "Plumb plan." I regard the Plumb plan as so objectionable that I consider it a public service to make it known that it will meet with determined opposition and little support in Congress.

I had intended to discuss it orally, but there are a number of bills being pressed before the Senate for immediate consideration, and I will not occupy the time of the Senate to discuss this measure at present.

A short time ago I received a letter from excellent citizens connected, I believe, with an organization of railroad men in Savannah, Ga., asking me to support the Plumb plan. In answer to the letter, I wrote stating that I was opposed to it and could not support it.

My answer points out a number of objections to the Plumb plan and instead of addressing the Senate at this time I wish to place this letter in the RECORD. I wish it to appear that the publication is made at my instance, and I ask leave to have it printed without reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 21, 1919.

Mr. J. C. TYSON,
Secretary Savannah Chamber of Industry,
Savannah, Ga.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of August 18 reached me to-day. You write in view of the fact that I have expressed my opinion against the Plumb plan, you, representing a majority of the voters of Chatham County, request that I use all of my efforts and influence to have this plan passed.

I do not understand exactly what you mean, and I can not think it possible that a majority of voters of Chatham County approve the Plumb plan. Indeed, when fully understood, I can not believe that any considerable number of voters of Chatham County or the State of Georgia will approve this plan.

I am opposed to it, and if it ever becomes live enough in the Senate to require it, I shall freely expose its indefensible features.

The Plumb plan provides that the Government shall buy all the railroad properties in the United States and put them into the possession of a corporation to be known as the National Railway Operating Corporation. The corporation is to have no capital stock. It is to operate all the railroads of the United States for 100 years, under a board of directors consisting of 15 men—5 to be named by the President and confirmed by the Senate, 5 to be selected by the classified employees of the railroads, and 5 to be named by the other employees of the railroads.

Mr. Plumb, in February, before the Senate Interstate Commerce Commission, estimated that the railroads would cost $18,000,000,000. The owners of the railroads insist that they are worth more, and at present high prices in effort to condemn them would meet decisions placing their value at higher figures, but for the present I will consider them as costing the Government $18,000,000,000.

If the Government were to purchase these properties it would be necessary to sell bonds to raise the money. You know how difficult it was to sell Liberty and Victory bonds. They were bought largely as the result of patriotism, to conduct the war, and to settle war liabilities. The bonds already put upon the market for war purposes have created a vast expansion of credit. To put $18,000,000,000 more bonds upon the market would be most unfortunate. They could not be sold except at a very high rate of interest, and it is hard to estimate the injurious effect it would have upon conditions generally.

The Plumb plan proposes that all the railroads shall be operated under a single management. Conditions in different parts of the United States are so varied that I do not believe it practicable to operate, successfully, all the railroads under a single management. Passing by the loss of competition, which is essential to efficient management, the lack of knowledge of any one set of men of all the conditions so vitally affected by transportation render it impossible for the railroads to be satisfactorily operated by a single management.

The difficulty we have had with the railroads in the hands of the Government, and the failure to appreciate our local conditions during the past 18 months, illustrate and prove the soundness of this objection.

The Plumb plan proposes that after paying interest on the bonds, and the salaries and compensation fixed for the employees, the surplus of profits shall be divided between the employees and the Government. I regard it as impossible to operate the railroads economically under the plan proposed. Instead of there being a surplus there will be a continued deficit, as there has been under Government operation during the past several months.

If there is a surplus, it is to be divided between the operators and the Government. If there is a deficit, as I am confident there would be, it would be borne by the public. This I regard as unfair.

The Plumb plan proposes that the Government, all the people, should pay for the property, and that the employees, one-tenth of the people, should control the operation of the property. We have 110,000,000 people in the United States. There are about 2,000,000 employed on the railroads. Allowing to each a family of five, it would make 10,000,000 people, including the families, connected with the railroads.

The Plumb plan requires the 110,000,000 people to pay $18,000,000,000 or more for the railroad properties and turn them over to the control of the 10,000,000 people. That is to say, all of the people are to pay for the property and turn it over to one-eleventh of the people. This one-eleventh will be directly interested in salaries and compensation. They will be operating the railroads of all of the people for the benefit of themselves, one-eleventh of the people. They will fix their own compensation as they see fit, without reference to the views of the other ten-elevenths of the people, who must bear the burden of the enterprise.

While it is true that the Plumb plan authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission to direct the costs of freight and passenger transportation, still, as the expenses of operation must be derived from the charges for transportation, or else out of the National Treasury, the cost of transportation must be made as high as the operatives of the roads wish to make their demands for compensation.

The Plumb plan therefore requires all the people to pay for the properties, and one-eleventh of the people to handle the properties as they see fit, paying themselves what they see fit, and placing upon the balance of the people all the burden they wish through high rates of transportation.

This proposition is so unreasonable that its unfairness should be clear to the operators of the railroads. It is worse than socialism. The Socialist's plan is to have all the people own and all the people operate the industries for the benefit of all the people. The Plumb plan is to have all the people own the railroads and one-eleventh of the people operate them for their own benefit and burden the balance of the people to any extent they see fit.

For many years I have sought earnestly to aid the employees of railroad companies to obtain justice. I have insisted that they were entitled to be heard by the owners of the properties in determining fair rates of compensation and hours and conditions of labor. I have insisted that if the two could not agree impartial arbitrators should settle their disputes.

Railroad transportation is essential to the occupation and to the very life of all of the people of our country. The rates of transportation and the compensation of employees are so interwoven that they should be passed upon by an impartial tribunal, deciding what is right and just, both for the employees and for the public, who pay the charges.

I favor lodging authority in an impartial tribunal to fix both the cost of transportation and the compensation of employees. This is the same principle that the railroad employees advocated a few years ago. I still believe in it. I know it is right. I am utterly opposed to requiring all of the people to put up the money to buy the railroads, and then to permit the employees of the railroads to control the property and put whatever burdens they see fit upon the balance of their fellow citizens. To yield to such a contention would be as inexcusable as to have said to the owners of the properties years ago, "Treat your employees just as you see fit."

From the fact that you urge me to support the Plumb plan I am forced to believe that you have not studied or realized the true effect of this measure. Railroad employees ought not to support it. They can not afford to put themselves in the position of seeking unfair advantage over the balance of their fellow citizens. Justice and right should control all, and it would be unjust for one-eleventh of the people to take the railroads and use them for their own benefit, with unrestrained authority to burden the balance of their fellow citizens.

I believe when you really study the Plumb plan you will withdraw any suggestions that I should support it, and I know the majority of the voters of Chatham County will be opposed to it.

Very truly, yours,

HOKE SMITH.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, several days ago I received a resolution from the Trades and Labor Council of Memphis, Tenn., favoring the so-called Plumb plan of railroad operation. I am opposed to the Plumb plan and have written the Trades and Labor Council stating my position. Rather than state it on the floor, I am going to ask unanimous consent to submit the letter to go into the RECORD, together with the resolution of the Trades and Labor Council, so there may be no misunderstanding as to my position in the matter.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON CIVIL SERVICE AND RETRENCHMENT,
August 27, 1919.

Mr. C. H. SCOTT,
Secretary Trades and Labor Council, Memphis, Tenn.

MY DEAR MR. SCOTT: I have just received the resolution of the Trades and Labor Council of date August 21, which is as follows:

"Whereas the Plumb plan of railroad control is now before the Congress of the United States;

"Whereas the Plumb plan of railroad control has the entire indorsement of the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled;

"Whereas we believe that this is the only plan that will prevent overcapitalization, graft, and the looting of the public pocketbook: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Trades and Labor Council most heartily indorse the Plumb plan of railroad control as being the only democratic and just method of railroad administration.

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Congressmen and Senators of Tennessee."

Replying to your resolution, I beg leave to say that under the Plumb plan the railroads are to be purchased by the Government, and in order to purchase them twenty billions of bonds are to be issued by the Government to pay for them. When the railroads are bought and paid for, they are to be put under a board of directors of 15 members, 5 of whom are to be selected by employees of the railroads, 5 by official employees of said railroads, and 5 by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

It will thus be seen that this bill proposes that the railroads are to be bought and paid for by the Government and then turned over to a committee of official and classified employees of the road for management and operation.

Since I have been a Member of the Congress I have uniformly favored practically all legislation looking to the betterment of labor. I believe I have voted for every labor measure that has passed, including the Adamson law. I believed that such measures were right.

My sympathies are with the men and women of this country who earn their bread by the sweat of their faces; but, my friends, in this instance I can not agree with the request made in your resolution. To dispose of the railroads in this manner would be injurious to the efficient management of the railroads themselves, injurious to the traveling public and to the shipping public, injurious to the development and growth of our country and to its progress and prosperity, and, above all, would in the end, in my judgment, prove disastrous to labor itself. Therefore I can not vote for the measure, but I shall vote against it.

During the war the Government has operated the railroads, the telegraph and telephone lines. It appeared absolutely necessary to do this as a war measure, and only because of the war. In each case Government operation and control was full and complete, just as full and complete as it would be under this law. In each case Government control and operation has proved a failure.

As a business proposition the Government has been the loser by hundreds of millions of dollars each year on railroads alone. From the standpoint of service rendered, Government operation has been distressingly inefficient and unsatisfactory. As a business venture it has been even more unsatisfactory. Though permitted to raise rates far beyond every bound of reason, still it is claimed that the revenues are not enough to pay rents and expenses by hundreds of millions each year, and the people are being taxed to pay the deficits.

With this record staring us in the face, it would be little short of simple-minded to continue Government operation.

Again, in all frankness, the Government is not in a position to buy the railroads. When our war bills are finally settled our Nation will owe in excess of $30,000,000,000, and our bonds are below par now and, of course, will go lower with every additional bond issue. If we buy the railroads the Government will have to go in debt twenty billion more. The interest alone that the Government would have to pay would amount to two and a half billions of dollars per year, more than twice as much as our entire cost of Government before the war.

This would impose a burden of taxation upon the people that would be intolerable. In addition, if the Plumb governmental plan should prove to be no better than the present governmental ownership and operation, and we have no reason to believe it will be, we would have to impose other taxes every year to meet the deficits, just as we are doing now.

Again, in my judgment, the Plumb plan is unsound in principle and unjustifiable in policy. It would be class legislation of the most obvious type. It is undemocratic, socialistic, and anarchistic and un-American. It takes this particular class of property from all of the people and gives it to a class only. Bolshevism takes private property from some of the people without payment and gives it to all the people. This plan out-Bolshevists Bolshevism. It gives to the present private owners of the railroad better property than they had before, viz, Government bonds, and then takes the property and gives it ostensibly to a comparatively small class of our people, but in reality to 10 out of 15 directors, composed of 5 representatives of the operative officers and 5 of the representatives of the operative men. But if the plan is unsound in principle it is even more unsound as a matter of policy. If the Government buys the railroads and gives the property to the officers and employees thereof, why should it not in like manner buy all the banks of the country, issue its bonds to the bank owners, and turn the bank properties over to the officers and employees of the banks? In like manner why should it not buy all the mills, factories, mines, public-service companies, and every kind of company, turning the property over to the officers and employees of the said several companies? Surely, if such a policy were adopted any sane man could see that it would soon lead to chaos and ruin. Bolshevist Russia has never gone this far.

The plan would not prevent overcapitalization, but its first step would be to give to the owners of the railroads par value for all the watered stock that is now in them, and in my judgment graft and looting of the public would proceed under this plan in a perfect frenzy of riot. The owners of the railroads would doubtless be delighted to exchange their holdings for Government bonds. But other than the owners and the 10 directors to whom this $20,000,000,000 of property is given, I do not see that anybody will be benefited by the enactment of this proposed law. I am sure that the rank and file of railroad employees will not be benefited.

I am sending you a copy of the bill. I hope you will read it and consider it yourselves on its merits, and when you do I am sure you will advise me that it is to your interest that I should vote against this vicious and un-American plan.

My own view is that the Congress should pass legislation returning the railroads to their owners at the earliest possible moment—indeed, it should have been done long ago; that the principle of competition among railroads should be restored to the fullest degree possible; the strictest regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission should be had; that no guaranty of any kind should be made by the Government to the owners of these roads as to income or profits; that the strictest governmental supervision should be established over all questions pertaining to them; that freight and passenger rates should be reduced as rapidly as possible; that bond and stock issues by railroads should be strictly guarded by the Government so that the public might not be imopsed upon; and that a plan should be devised by which every sound and efficiently managed road would be able to obtain proper financial credits. Efficiency and economy in management and service to the public ought to be fostered and heavy penalties should be visited upon all managers or owners of roads who exploit them for selfish ends or who gamble upon their outcome or profiteer upon their necessities.

Every safeguard should be placed around the interests and rights of the operating officials and operating men, and the affairs of the railroads should be so regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission as to make the owners and operators virtually partners in their operation without injury to the public. There is no reason whatever why, under the guidance of the Interstate Commerce Commission, a profit-sharing plan should not be worked out and agreed upon between the owners and operators so that the highest economy and efficiency in operation of the roads can be had, and the increased profits naturally arising from such efficient operation divided among those justly entitled to them.

With kind personal regards to you all, who have always been my good friends, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CALDER. I present resolutions unanimously adopted on August 5 at a meeting of the executive committee of the Associated Industries of Massachusetts, opposing Government ownership or Government operation of railroads as set forth in the plan of the railroad brotherhoods. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions unanimously adopted at a meeting of the executive committee of the Associated Industries of Massachusetts, Tuesday, August 5, 1919.

Whereas the proposition is before Congress to nationalize the railroads of the country, which is stated to be the first step in the nationalization of industry: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Associated Industries of Massachusetts declares itself emphatically and unqualifiedly opposed to Government ownership or Government operation of railroads as set forth in the plan of the railroad brotherhoods, which, in our estimation, is the most serious menace to the welfare of the Nation of any legislation presented to Congress since we became a Republic; and also

Resolved, That we are unalterably opposed to the continuation of Government operation with all its inefficiency, poor service, and high costs of transportation, and that we are in favor of an immediate return of the railroads to their owners; and

Resolved, That we are utterly and forever opposed to the nationalization of industry since this will result in ruin to the industries, the workers, and the Nation.

It was also voted that a committee of six, including the president ex officio, be appointed by the president to take such measures as may seem advisable to combat the menace to the Nation of the plan of nationalizing the railroads as proposed by the railroad brotherhoods, with full power to act.

Mr. HALE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Westbrook, Auburn, and Augusta, all in the State of Maine, praying for an increase in the salaries of postal clerks, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the mayor, aldermen, and common council of Bath, Me., praying for an investigation into the high cost of living, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Portland, Me., remonstrating against the methods now being employed by the railroad labor unions, particularly in regard to strikes, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of York, Me., praying for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building at that place, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented memorials of sundry retail merchants of Madison, of the Chamber of Commerce of Bath, and of the Retail Merchants' Association of Gardiner, all in the State of Maine, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation requiring retail merchants and dealers to mark the cost price of their commodities, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of sundry postal clerks and carriers of New Haven, Derby, Hartford, Middletown, Waterbury, and Southington, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of sundry Lithuanian citizens of Thompsonville, Conn., praying that the United States Government recognize the independence of the Lithuanian Republic and praying for the withdrawal of the Polish Army from Lithuanian territory, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the committee of members from Connecticut of the convention of the Friends of Greece, praying for the return of Thrace and North Epirus to Greece instead of to Bulgaria, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Stamford, Willimantic, New Haven, and Seymour, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Bantam Ball Bearing Co., of Bantam, Conn., praying for immediate action on the question of the high cost of living, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Meriden, Conn., praying for the repeal of the tax on ice cream, soda, and soft drinks, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Excelsior Lodge, No. 259, International Association of Machinists, of Derby, Conn., praying for the passage of the so-called Sterling civil-service retirement bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PAGE presented a memorial of the Sodality of the Immaculate Conception of St. Peter's Parish, of Rutland, Vt., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present petitions from certain retail merchants and business men of Texas in behalf of the Kenyon bill regulating packers. I ask that the heading of one of the petitions be printed in the RECORD and that they be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the petitions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and the heading of one of them was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Kenyon bill (S. 2202) regulating the threatened monopoly of all food products by the meat-packing combination.

To the President of the United States and the Members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives:

We, the undersigned retail merchants and business men of Texas, respectfully ask your favorable consideration and support of the above bill, believing that it affords the readiest remedy for the prevailing social unrest caused by the abnormal and unjustifiable high prices of food commodities, as demonstrated by the Hoover and Federal Trade Commission reports. We believe that these high prices are chiefly caused by improper combinations of the packing interests, and that such proper regulation of same as is embodied in the Kenyon bill will do more to put an end to the discontent that is breeding Bolshevism than any other piece of legislation before the present Congress.

Respectfully,

_____.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have received a large number of letters relative to the present state of affairs in Lithuania. I have selected one from among numerous others of a similar tenor, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2236) relating to affidavits required by the act entitled "An act to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war, which were, on page 1, line 10, after "plaintiff," to insert "after such notice as the court may prescribe"; on page 2, line 3, after "judgment," to insert "if otherwise legal"; on page 2, line 4, to strike out "thereof" and insert "of such judgment as if such affidavit had been duly filed"; on page 2, line 6, to strike out "guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be"; on page 2, line 7, to strike out "one year" and insert "two years"; and on page 2, line 8, to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. LENROOT. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 3171. An act to amend the practice and procedure in Federal courts, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have received a number of telegrams in regard to the leasing bill which is now under consideration making urgent request that parties who have gone upon the public domain under existing law and have started to discover oil should be protected; that they should be permitted to go ahead with the work which they have undertaken, and should have the benefit of the existing law. I am not prepared at this moment to say that that is the best thing that could be done for them, nor am I prepared to say that it is the best thing that could be done for the Government and in the genuine interest of oil development. I present these telegrams, however. They are most urgent. One of them comes from the acting governor of New Mexico and the other telegrams are from various prominent citizens of that State.

There has within the last few months been very great activity in that State looking to the development of oil, and these people have gone upon these lands under existing law and have acquired rights; that is to say, they have been prosecuting this work under the invitation the Government has held out to them by existing legislation. While this bill in the last section does protect all "valid claims," it is feared that the word "claims" as used in that connection would be construed to mean a valid location after discovery, and therefore would take away from these people all rights which they have acquired under existing law. I think it is quite evident that they should be protected in some manner. They would be quite content to be permitted to go ahead under existing law and take their chances on a compliance with the law and make the discovery on each 160 acres, but my present view is that they would be better protected if they were given the preference right to a permit to prospect, which would enable them to join together in their claims and secure in one block 2,560 acres, which would be an inducement for people to put up the money with which to drill wells.

I believe that going into a wildcat country—and I use that expression in the sense in which it is thoroughly understood and not in any derogatory sense whatever—going into a new country any prospector ought to have the right to develop not merely 160 acres but at least 2,560 acres. I have heretofore explained to the Senate that in the case of private holdings very much greater areas than 2,560 acres are being given under lease for the purpose of getting wells drilled and prospecting the country, but under this bill we are proposing to limit it to 2,560 acres. That amount, at least, should be included in any one permit or should be given as the prospective benefit which the man would get who actually goes upon the land and drills.

Before this bill is finally passed I may offer an amendment to the effect that these people shall be permitted to go ahead under existing law and perfect their title if they can; but, at any rate, for the present I content myself by offering the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. On page 18 it is proposed to strike out from line 1 to line 9, inclusive, and to insert the following:

SEC. 19. That any person who, at the time of any withdrawal order, was a bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas lands not withdrawn from entry and who had previously performed all acts under then existing laws necessary to valid locations thereof except to make discovery, and any person who at the time of the passage of this act is a bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas lands not withdrawn from entry and who shall have performed all acts under existing laws necessary to valid locations thereof except to make discovery—

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The amendment just read by the Secretary ends without any punctuation at all, and would be followed by the language of the bill beginning on page 18, line 10, which is as follows:

if application therefor shall be made within six months from the passage of this act shall be entitled to prospecting permits thereon upon the same terms and conditions as other permits provided for in this act.

That amendment simply gives the preferential right for a permit to the people who have gone upon this land. Where they have made their locations in areas of 160 acres or less, I have not any doubt that the locators would combine in asking for a permit to prospect as much as 2,560 acres.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has the floor, and he would very much like to proceed with what he has to say on the general subject. Then when the Senator from New Mexico offers his amendment we can both discuss the question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I beg pardon of the Senator from Wisconsin. I did not know that he still had the floor. I shall be glad to defer to him and take up the matter later.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before the Senator from Wisconsin proceeds, I rise to a matter of personal privilege. In the course of the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin on yesterday he commented, as I have been told, upon the fact that but very few Senators were in the Chamber, and he called the names of those who were present. The RECORD of the proceedings has not been published, and I know of this only by being told of it. My name will not appear among those who were present because I could not be present and knew nothing about it except as I was told near the close of the session.

I desire to say, however, that I have been in my seat almost continuously since the consideration of this bill began. I was called from the Chamber by cards sent me by constituents on a number of occasions yesterday, and I have no doubt that it was on one of those occasions that the incident to which I refer occurred.

The Senator from Wisconsin will very readily understand that it is not possible for Senators to be in the Senate Chamber at all times. Indeed, my recollection is that while the bill was under consideration some three or four days before he began his speech, the Senator from Wisconsin found it possible to be here himself only on rare occasions and then for brief periods.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE resumed the speech begun by him yesterday. After having spoken for nearly three hours,

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield the floor for the present.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the Senator quits the floor I wish to call his attention to a matter that may be of interest to him. He has been discussing the provisions of the bill with relation to the naval reserves. I will say to the Senator that that feature of the matter has never engaged my especial attention; there are no withdrawn areas in my State, so that I have only the interest in this question that Senators generally have, and I say to the Senator that I have never followed either the matter of the withdrawal or the matter of reserves with any particular care. But I have received a letter this morning sent me by Mr. Phelan, of the Shipping Board, who makes a suggestion very pertinent to the matter. I ask to have the letter read from the desk for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DIVISION OF OPERATION,
UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
EMERGENCY FLEET CORPORATION,
Washington, August 28, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WALSH: In connection with the discussion over naval reserves Nos. 1 and 2 in the State of California, permit me to say that it is an utter impossibility to conserve the gas and oil in these reserves unless the Navy can secure the absolute title to the subsoil in all the sections in these reserves, and that is impossible.

To begin with, the Standard Oil Co. is the owner or has a State lease on section 38, township 30, range 23; section 16, township 31, range 23; section 36, township 31, range 23; section 16, township 32, range 24; section 16, township 31, range 24; all of which are in these two naval reserves, and all of which are being developed with the usual diligence of this great corporation. In addition to the holdings of the Standard Oil Co. in these two reserves, the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. has a grant on every other section, and while the Government is disputing this grant, the railroad corporation has won a victory in the United States District Court in the case of No. 2, and a victory in the United States Circuit Court in the case of No. 1.

For the past nine years development work has progressed on these two reserves, hundreds of wells have been drilled in, and more than 100,000,000 barrels of oil have been extracted. The reserves are now in such a shape that the various punctures in the different zones are fast reducing the gas pressure, and within a very few years the production per well will be materially reduced. Unless some legislation is enacted giving the Government the right to secure some royalty oil in these reserves, or unless the Navy itself drills in the territory to which it has a clear title, the Standard Oil Co. and the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. by reason of their widely scattered acreage, and the fact that they have the best selections, means that the reserves will, if not be entirely depleted of oil, have the available oil reduced to a minimum.

I have no hesitancy in saying that the delay in the passage of a general leasing bill has enriched the Standard Oil Co. millions of dollars, and any continued delay will work to the sole advantage of that company.

Only a few days ago the Standard Oil Co. bought in the largest gas well in the history of the oil and gas business in naval reserve No. 1, and the taking of this gas means a reduction in the pressure for the extraction of oil through this reserve and a great loss to the Navy.

Very sincerely, yours,

JOSEPH A. PHELAN,
Oil Examiner.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I submit the letter at this time. I have no very definite knowledge about the matters to which it refers, except as stated in the letter; but I commend the suggestion of the letter to the Senator from Wisconsin, who has apparently given considerable attention to the subject of the provision in relation to the naval reserves. It recites that the Standard Oil Co. has acquired title to at least one section of this land, the title apparently not being in dispute, being derived from the State of California; that it is now draining the field through that particular oil well; and that in view of that situation of affairs, not only is the oil drained but the gas pressure is reduced so that it is doubtful whether the character of a reservoir will continue very long.

I will say to the Senator that I know enough about it to know that testimony of that character was submitted by some very practical oil men, and it will be found in the hearings; and I was present one day at the hearings, I recall, when Secretary Daniels was there, and his attention was called to that testimony. It did not excite his apprehensions, however, I will say to the Senator from Utah, but my own have not been stilled. Here is this great well being operated by the Standard Oil Co., pumping away daily and removing the oil. We all know that petroleum exists throughout the field, and I suppose probably the area that will be drained by one well is more or less problematical. I suggest to the Senator that perhaps, in connection with his motion to strike out section 18, he might be disposed to submit an amendment authorizing the Navy Department to take steps to drill in the field and at least get its share of the oil before it is gone.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say to the Senator that I am very glad he has called my attention to this matter, and I shall make some comment upon it. I have a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy which I do not find among my papers; I think I must have left it in my office; but at that time I shall want to make reference to that.

EXPENSES OF AMERICAN COMMISSION TO NEGOTIATE PEACE (S. DOC. NO. 80).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

At the close of the last session of Congress, after it had become certain that the Peace Conference at Paris would not be able to conclude its work until after the expiration of the fiscal year, on June 30, 1919, when the existing appropriations from which the expenses of the American Commission were being paid would cease to be available, the Acting Secretary of State submitted, at my direction, a request for an additional appropriation of $5,000,000. That amount was requested first, in order to defray the expenses of the American participation in the Conference at Paris until the close of its deliberations; and second, to meet the initial expenses of the American participation in the various commissions and agencies which the Treaty with Germany provides shall be set up immediately after the ratification of that Treaty.

No action having been taken on that request by Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury, at my direction, in a letter to the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, in June last, pointed out the urgency of providing for the expenses of the American Commission and this was followed by a communication from the Acting Secretary of State further explaining the necessity of the appropriation. No steps have yet been taken to provide for the expenses of the American delegation in Paris, or of the agencies necessary to the discharge of its duties since July 1, 1919, when the appropriation for the National Security and Defense ceased to be available. It is therefore incumbent upon me again to bring the matter to your attention and point out the urgency of making suitable appropriations for the expenses of the commission. Meanwhile I have been compelled to make use of part of the emergency fund of the Department of State for the expenses of the Commission, which is unfortunate in view of the large demand which it is foreseen will be made upon that fund during the current fiscal year.

Inasmuch as there might be objection to providing money at this time for the execution of any of the provisions of the treaty, when ratified, it is not desired now to ask your attention to that part of the estimate submitted.

I assume that no explanation is necessary of the continued presence of the Commission in Paris since everyone knows that although the treaty with Germany is now before the Senate, treaties with Austria, Turkey and Bulgaria are yet to be completed, and many other matters of actual and potential concern to this country require careful attention of the American representatives.

The purposes for which an additional appropriation is needed will be indicated by the enclosed statement of the expenditures already made and the liabilities growing out of the Peace Conference. In considering these expenses and estimates, it should be borne in mind that for a time the personnel of the American delegation numbered more than 1,300 persons and on July 31 last had been reduced to about 400, about 88 of whom were civilians, the remainder being from the Army and Navy. The conference has been held at a time when conditions in France are abnormal, prices of food being more than 120% greater than a year ago; railroad transportation having increased more than 150%; fuel not only difficult to obtain, but only obtainable at prices over 200% higher than before the war. Although an Army Commissary has been utilized for the most part, the prices paid have, notwithstanding, been vastly greater than in pre-war times. Then, too, means of communication and the usual channels of information have been so greatly impaired, as a result of the war, that not only has it been necessary, to maintain an expensive courier system but, in many instances, commissions have had to be despatched for purposes of investigation in order that the American Commission might be in a position to act intelligently and upon information, the accuracy of which had been positively established. These unusual conditions have made the work of the Commission expensive, although I have no hesitation in saying that, considering the magnitude of the task, and the extent to which the Commission was obliged to rely upon its own agencies, instead of upon those available in normal times the expenses have been and are very modest.

It is obviously not possible at present to estimate how much longer the conference may be in session, but assuming that its work shall extend to the end of the calendar year, December 31, 1919, which I think may be regarded as the maximum, the sum of $825,000 will be required for the expenses. I hope that this amount may be appropriated at an early date.

WOODROW WILSON.

(Enclosures:—Statement as described above.)

THE WHITE HOUSE,
28 August, 1919.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the estimates and expenditures referred to be also read.

JAPANESE INTERESTS IN CHINA.

Mr. LODGE. I send to the desk a telegram from Portland, Oreg., which I should like to have read. It is very short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., August 27, 1919.

We urge you not to allow surface indications produced by propaganda to deceive and cover true American spirit of justice and righteousness which permeates every honest soul in our beloved country.

UNITED IRISH SOCIETIES.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has been discussing for about six hours questions foreign to the pending bill. I do not at this time wish to answer the statements made by the Senator, in which he undertook to connect certain reports made upon entirely different bills years ago with the pending measure. I simply want to say that section 18 of the bill provides—

That as to all like claims situated within any naval petroleum reserve the producing wells thereon only shall be leased.

Nobody who knows anything about oil conditions thinks for a minute that the producing wells can be successfully closed and the oil remaining in the ground saved to some future time. Those wells must continue to produce, and if they do not, the whole oil reserves are likely to be lost.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NUGENT. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the provision in the second paragraph of section 18, which will be found on page 16, which provides that in addition to the wells in operation other areas may be leased.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; by order of the President. That is only in case the President finds out that it is really necessary to produce more oil for the Navy or for commerce, in which case he can grant additional leases on lands already relinquished to the Government. I do not think the Senator from Idaho will for a minute take the position that that power should not be granted to the President.

Mr. NUGENT. If the Senator please, I will say that it is quite apparent to my mind, and it must be apparent to the mind of the Senator from Utah, that neither the President nor the head of any department of the Government attends to or can possibly attend to any of such matters himself; that he must, as a matter of course, depend upon the reports made to him by subordinates.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator think that the Secretary of the Interior would advise the President of the United States to issue a lease to anyone within the naval reserve unless he positively knew that it was required?

Mr. NUGENT. No; I do not believe that he would do that.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be the only process under the provisions of the section by which it could be accomplished.

Mr. NUGENT. Neither do I understand that these leases are to be given for the benefit of the Navy. As I read the proviso in the bill, it is merely to the effect that another well may be drilled within 660 feet of the original well with the consent of the lessee of the original well.

There is nothing, so far as this provision is concerned, that relates to the furnishing of oil to the Navy. In other words, the wells may be drilled by private individuals, and the oils derived from the wells may be disposed of by them in such manner as they see fit, absolutely regardless of the Navy or the fact that the lands were reserved for naval purposes. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. If we had a President of the United States who did not desire to protect the oil for the Navy and who paid no attention to the real necessity of developing oil on the naval reserve, the position taken by the Senator from Idaho perhaps would be correct, but I can not conceive of such a President.

Mr. NUGENT. Does the Senator contend that in the new leases to be given on these naval-reserve lands the oil taken from them shall be stored for the use of the Government?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator does not pretend to say that, nor does the bill provide it.

Mr. NUGENT. Does not the Senator think that the leases can be granted to private individuals, and that they can dispose of the oil in such manner as they see fit?

Mr. SMOOT. If the condition arises on a reserve, and the President, in his judgment, after an examination and with the Secretary of the Interior advising him of the situation, feels that it is absolutely necessary to protect the oil that is in the ground for some reason which we may not know now, I think the President ought to have the right and the power to say that he can make such leases.

Mr. NUGENT. Does the Senator take the position that in order to protect the oil on these naval reserves it will be necessary to drill wells and withdraw the oil from the land by private persons, to be disposed of as they see fit?

Mr. SMOOT. There are oil wells now producing oil. The only way to save the oil of such wells or within a certain limit of the wells now producing the oil is to continue flow, and if the Senator or anyone else undertook to stop the flow, more than likely within a very short time the gas would escape and there would be no pressure to produce the oil later, and water would come in and the whole oil field would be destroyed.

Mr. NUGENT. In order to carry out that purpose, additional wells will be drilled within the naval reserve?

Mr. SMOOT. Not necessarily, and the bill does not provide that. The President, as I said before, may authorize the leasing of additional wells.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to ask, in view of the question propounded by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT], if the bill does not authorize either the Navy or the Interior Department to put down upon a naval reserve offset wells to save the interests of the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no limit so far as that is concerned. There is nothing in the bill to prevent the development in any way of these oil lands by the Government.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] for my information what feature of the bill is the subject of his inquiry and what is his view with respect to it?

Mr. NUGENT. My inquiry was directed to the provision contained on page 16 of the bill, commencing in line 16, which reads as follows:

Provided, however, That as to all like claims situate within any naval petroleum reserve the producing wells thereon only shall be leased, together with an area of land sufficient for the operation thereof, upon the terms and payment of royalties for past and future production as herein provided for in the leasing of claims. No wells shall be drilled in the land subject to this provision within 660 feet of any such leased well without the consent of the lessee.

That is the provision to which my inquiry was directed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me inquire what is the view of the Senator? I understand the lessee gets an opportunity to work only one well.

Mr. NUGENT. Only one well.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And the Government has the right otherwise to sink wells anywhere it sees fit; but, of course, if it sunk a well 20 feet away from the lessee's well his lease would not be of very much value.

Mr. NUGENT. I do not so construe the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Must you not fix some area around his well within which the Government should not be permitted to drill another well?

Mr. NUGENT. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that the bill itself specifically provides that a well shall not be bored within 660 feet of a leased well.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the provision which the Senator from Idaho has just read.

Mr. NUGENT. That is just what I read:

No wells shall be drilled in land subject to this provision within 660 feet of any such leased well without the consent of the lessee.

The matter presented to my mind was whether it was the intent of the framers of this legislation to provide that leases might be given to private individuals to drill wells within the naval petroleum reserve within 660 feet of the wells leased, provided the lessee of such leased wells would consent to it, my idea being that if that were true a very considerable number of men might go on one of these naval peroleum reserves and by some sort of agreement entered into among themselves would agree that they would give permission that leases might be granted in the reserve to each other, and if the Government could be induced to grant those leases as a matter of fact in a short period of time those lands would absolutely be drained of their oil. That was the matter of which I made inquiry.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It occurs to me that this is preventive of that.

Mr. NUGENT. I doubt it very much.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I find myself unable to follow the Senator. As I understand the matter, a lease of a producing well may be executed by the Government to the man who owns or claims that well.

Mr. NUGENT. I understand that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then it provides that the Government may, if it cares to do so, sink wells itself, and it may authorize others to go and do likewise, but it can not authorize a well within 660 feet of this well—that is to say, the lessee is protected to that extent.

Mr. NUGENT. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Beyond that the Government may authorize other people to go on and dig wells.

Mr. NUGENT. That is precisely the matter on which I was endeavoring to secure information. I am endeavoring to point out that the lessees of the leased wells are entitled under this provision to give their consent to the drilling of other wells within 660 feet of their wells. So I say that being true, if a considerable number of men entered into an agreement of that character, and the Government could be induced to issue leases to them, it would not be any great length of time before the entire naval petroleum reserve would be drained of its oil.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I confess I can not follow the Senator at all.

Mr. NUGENT. I regret very much I do not make myself clear.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NUGENT. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I call attention to the next proviso, where the President is given the fullest power to lease all the naval reserve, if he sees fit.

Mr. NUGENT. I am well aware of that.

Mr. LENROOT. So the 660 feet provision can have no reference except for the protection of the lessee of an existing well.

Mr. NUGENT. That is true.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Idaho must admit that an oil man certainly has got to have some acreage of land before he will take a lease.

Mr. NUGENT. I am not disputing that proposition at all. As I said before, and stated repeatedly, and I am sorry I have not made myself sufficiently clear, it appears to me that under the provision which I have read, and to which the Senator calls attention, it is probable or possible that all the oil within the lands reserved for naval purposes can be taken out——

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NUGENT. And to that I am opposed. I yield to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. The position of the Senator from Idaho, as I understand it, in part is this: He thinks that the provisions of the bill do not sufficiently protect the oil reserves, so that some official of the Government, either the Secretary of the Interior or the President, may, by some improvident action upon his part, drain these oil-producing fields at an early date.

Mr. NUGENT. I say that that might be done, and I believe these naval reserves should not be operated, and the oils within those lands should be preserved.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator's position, in brief, is this: He thinks the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Interior, or any person in charge of the administration of this act, ought to have no authority whatever to execute these leases in his discretion.

Mr. NUGENT. That is precisely it. If the oil contained within these reserves is for naval purposes, it should remain there until a different condition prevails than at present obtains.

The statement has frequently been made during the progress of this debate, if I remember correctly, that the oil supply of the country is now or will at a comparatively early date be insufficient for our needs. If that statement is true, and I assume for the purpose of this discussion that it is, it appears to me to be a matter of vital importance that in view of the situation which prevails at this time throughout the world, and may prevail for some time to come, there should be no chances taken of any kind, character, or description of placing ourselves in a position where the safety of the United States might depend upon oil for the Navy and that oil not be forthcoming. For that reason, it is my contention that the oil within these naval-reserve lands should be preserved for the purposes for which it was intended until the expiration of some time at least. The Senator will remember that these leases extend for a period of 20 years.

Mr. KING. One further question, if the Senator will permit. Then it is the Senator's view that there ought not to be lodged with the President the discretion to open up these oil fields whenever he pleases, that if the exigency required oil for the operation of the Navy the President could not order or authorize the sinking of a well, but he would have to come to Congress and get additional legislation to authorize him to open up and develop the oil fields that have been reserved for producing oil for the Navy?

Mr. NUGENT. Far from it. It is the contention of the Senator from Idaho that the President should at any time have the authority to develop these oil fields for the purposes of the Navy, but I do contend that under no circumstances should the oil within the naval petroleum naval reserves be turned over to private interests.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me inquire of the Senator from Idaho whether it is not the succeeding proviso to which his criticism is directed—

Provided, however, That the President may, in his discretion, lease the remainder of any such claim upon which such wells have been drilled, and in the event of such leasing said claimant or his successor shall have a preference right to such lease.

Mr. NUGENT. If the Senator pleases, my criticism is directed to the entire section and I had intended to move to strike it out.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. NUGENT. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. The lands to which this section refers are the lands which are relinquished to the United States. The parties have a claim now and there must be oil-producing wells upon that claim. It is only upon the remainder of such claim after the claimant has been given the lease upon 640 acres that the President has the right then to give a lease upon that claim, a claim that has been relinquished to the Government of the United States. In that event the claimant or his successor shall have a preferential right to such lease on the claim that he has already relinquished to the Government.

As far as the balance of the lands in the naval reserve are concerned, that is, I mean where there has been no claimant and where it is now owned by the Government of the United States as a reserve, the bill has nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. NUGENT. If I understand it, and if the information that I have secured in respect to the matter is correct, it is to the effect that the bill is intended to relieve gentlemen who went upon these lands after the withdrawal order——

Mr. LENROOT. No; that is not true so far as the naval reserves are concerned at all.

Mr. NUGENT. Then if I understand it from the statement of the Senator there are no wells now in operation that were discovered upon these naval-reserve lands by men who had trespassed thereon after the issuance of the Executive order.

Mr. LENROOT. There are no existing wells upon naval reserve No. 2 where the claims were not initiated prior to the first withdrawal.

Mr. NUGENT. How is it with respect to the other reserves?

Mr. LENROOT. The other reserves are not affected in any way by this bill, because there are no wells upon either 2 or 3.

If the Senator will yield, I wish to ask him whether he realizes that it may very possibly arise that it is necessary to give the President authority to lease these lands in order to save the oil either for the Navy or royalty for the Government. Does the Senator realize that this oil drains a distance of 500 feet, that the oil can not be kept within a limited area? And if the Government should succeed in a relinquishment or through action in court or by action of the Secretary of the Interior in acquiring 160 acres of land upon which there are producing oil wells and there is private ownership surrounding that 160 acres, I want to say to the Senator that not a particle of that oil, so far as commercial quantity is concerned, can be conserved for the Navy. The only way in which the Government can get any benefit whatever out of that kind of a situation is either to dig the oil out itself through drilling its own wells or leasing it for a royalty, because at the end of 20 years there would be no oil left in that 160 acres.

Mr. NUGENT. What is there to prevent the Government from doing that?

Mr. LENROOT. Nothing.

Mr. NUGENT. Why should not that be done, then?

Mr LENROOT. I do not anticipate that for a small area of the kind I have described there would be the slightest occasion for the Government to go into the drilling of wells, when the Senator remembers that the Government gets at least one-eighth of all the oil that is produced under this bill which will be available for the Navy and for every other governmental purpose.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I very much regret that it has become necessary for me to again occupy the attention of the Senate while this bill is under discussion. Last Saturday I said all and more than I intended to offer upon that very important subject. But the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], in his very long and to-be-continued remarks, assumed a somewhat controversial attitude, possibly provoked by one or two interruptions of my own, and having reference to the previous history of attempted oil legislation, which seems to require consideration. I do not entertain the slightest hope of convincing the Senator from Wisconsin that I am right in my view of the merits of this bill, but I feel reasonably sure of my recollection concerning the character of the last one and the initial attitude of the Secretary of the Navy concerning it.

The Senator complained that this bill had been reported in a somewhat unusual manner, without any accompanying report and with little or no explanation, and that its vast importance certainly justified the committee, if, indeed, it did not require the committee, to hold extensive hearings concerning its many important features. I interrupted to remind the Senator that during the past five or six years much of the time of the Committees on Public Lands in both Houses had been given, and at great expense to the public, in hearing from all classes and conditions of men, beginning with the heads of departments in the President's Cabinet down to the most humble individual in the land who felt that he could offer anything of importance or of interest upon the subject, and that, as a consequence, the necessity for further hearings was neither obvious nor necessary. I repeat that assertion.

The Senator thought that the Secretary of the Navy, however, and the Attorney General, greatly interested in the subject matter of this bill, should have been heard upon it, to which I responded, and I think correctly, that this bill, so far as it goes—and, of course, it is confined to the subject of leasing—is very largely the bill which was killed here by a filibuster during the closing days of the last Congress. With that the Senator took issue, and at the same time emphasized the statement that the Secretary of the Navy and the Attorney General had not been truthfully represented on this floor by Senators when we were considering the conference report, who asserted that they were satisfied with the bill as it finally came from the conference committee. In order to sustain that assertion the Senator read a telegram from the Attorney General and a letter from the Secretary of the Navy dated in the month of February, 1918.

The record thus made is undoubtedly the fact, but it does not controvert the antecedent facts, and I want to give an outline of them. I am disposed when a colleague of mine on this floor makes an assertion to believe that assertion may be relied upon until the contrary appears, and even then, if there is merely a denial of his position, I want something more than the ipse dixit of an individual, I care not how high he may be in official station, to change my viewpoint concerning the credibility of the statement here made.

Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin, so keenly critical and so loud in complaint when a slender audience of Senators attends his addresses to this body, was not present during many of the discussions which took place here when we considered the bill to which I am referring. Let me say, however, with regard to that particular absence of the Senator, that he was, as I now remember, kept away because of the very serious illness of a member of his family. But while I am upon this subject, I may be pardoned for suggesting that it is not very palatable to be lectured for nonattendance by Senators who are conspicuous for their own absences from this floor during the discussion of very important subjects; and in that particular I know of no one who sins more constantly and generally, with one or two possible exceptions, than my friend the distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin, not only in his attendance upon the consideration of this bill alone but of many bills equally if not more important and requiring the best thought and the best attention of all of us if we are to thoroughly comprehend and intelligently dispose of them.

I said yesterday, and I repeat, that the most constant attendant upon our sessions at all times is the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and his colleague [Mr. KING] is a good second. My friend the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] is another constant attendant; the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] are nearly always in their seats, whether the proceedings be such as to attract crowded galleries or whether they merely embrace the humdrum routine of everyday senatorial business.

Of course, if such a man should arise and complain of my absence, however unmerited I might consider the complaint, I would certainly recognize his right to criticize my absence. I have been a fairly regular attendant on this body, and consequently I have heard much of the discussion regarding this bill and similar previous bills of other sessions which have been carefully considered in committee, then introduced here and debated at length. So if Senators are dilatory or negligent or unmindful of the vast importance of this particular bill and we speak to empty seats in the Chamber it is not an unusual thing, but one for which all so offending may cite the senior Senator from Wisconsin as a standing and shining example. So much for that criticism and complaint regarding the attendance of Members of the Senate.

One of my interruptions of the Senator from Wisconsin was to emphasize the fact that among those who had been heard patiently, exhaustively, and more than once in opposition to pending bills, in criticism of their contents and in recommendation of legislation, the Secretary of the Navy and the then Attorney General of the United States were conspicuous. Sometimes they attended in person and gave us the benefit of their illuminating wisdom upon the subject of oil lands in the West; sometimes they sent their assistants to speak for them; but never, Mr. President, were any of them denied a hearing or was the time of a single one of them ever limited.

I said that these gentlemen seemed to be content with the bill of the last session, because it had been so constructed ultimately as to exclude naval reserves from its operation, and that it was therefore a measure which could not have affected that important question, and did not affect it.

Now, let me go back to December, 1917. During that month the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], acting as the chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, introduced Senate bill No. 3521, and accompanied it with a motion that the bill be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. It was a bill, Mr. President, taking jurisdiction of the naval reserves, and containing provisions whereby the title to those reserves could be secured and confirmed in the Government of the United States. A number of us objected to the reference of such a bill, referring exclusively to the public domain, to any other than the Committee on Public Lands. Those of us who believed it should go to that committee discussed the question here for several days, with the result that on the 18th day of January, 1918, the Senate committed the unprecedented act of referring a public-land bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs by a vote of 40 to 17. At or about that time the Senator from Virginia—and I wish he were here—declared that the only interest which the Secretary of the Navy had in this legislation was its contemplated inclusion of the naval reserves, and with their exclusion he was satisfied to let the bill take its course. I think the Senator was authorized to make that statement. It is inconceivable that a man of his standing and character would have undertaken even by indirection to represent the Secretary of the Navy in such an important matter on his own motion or without previous complete authority to do so.

Mr. President, I join the Senator from Wisconsin in the high encomium which he paid this morning to the Secretary of the Navy. I think Mr. Daniels's career in that high office has been a great credit to the Nation and to himself. I think he is a man of sterling uprightness and unimpeachable integrity, a man who at all times conscientiously seeks to perform his duty, however mistaken his notions of that duty may be; and I do not propose to say anything which would even seem to challenge the Senator's judgment of this great man, except in so far as it may be necessary because of his attitude toward that bill, which finally was strangled upon this floor during the expiring hours of the last Congress.

The Secretary of the Navy was not satisfied very long with the arrangement which had been made in some degree by his authority. He was not content with the exclusion of his reserves at his own request, voiced from the lips of the Senator from Virginia, and their transfer to the tender care of the Naval Committee, which afterwards exercised absolute, exclusive, and unchallenged control of the naval reserve aspect of the public-land oil situation, for very soon he appeared, either in person or by representative, before the House committee to which the oil-leasing bill was sent after it passed the Senate; and very soon the Attorney General, either in person or by deputy, also appeared there in opposition to the bill, notwithstanding the fact that as passed by the Senate it did not and could not affect the possession by the Government of the naval oil reserves created in 1912 and subsequently.

In private life and among humble individuals such conduct would be regarded as an act of bad faith, but among those who occupy the seats of the mighty one can very easily take refuge in the assertion that the public interest being at stake understandings such as these should not for a moment be considered if they interfered with a discharge of duty along lines subsequently decided upon. As a consequence, from the time that bill reached the House committee up to the good hour when it was finally withdrawn from consideration here and perished by lapse of time, the Navy Department and the Department of Justice were constantly and mischievously conspicuous in their interference with the needs of the West, with the requirements of legislation, and the desires of the Secretary of the Interior, under whose jurisdiction until the good year 1916 all matters relating to the public lands were supposed to be. The Attorney General even permitted one of his satellites, an Assistant Attorney General of the United States, before the House committee publicly to impugn the integrity of the Secretary of the Interior and his subordinates by declaring that their opposition to certain sections of that bill was due to the fact that they felt that under its administration by the Interior Department all fraudulent locations and locators of oil claims would be protected and recognized, and by failing to repudiate him the honorable Attorney General acquiesced in that statement, thus placing an imputation upon the official character and good name of one of the most conscientious, upright, and capable Secretaries of the Interior this country ever had; and up to the good hour of Attorney General Gregory's resignation the Department of Justice gave no sign that the man who recorded that infamous slander was not authorized to do so. The present Attorney General has given that gentleman his congé, and appointed to succeed him a man who is incapable of such conduct either in office or out of it. That is the sort of treatment this much-needed legislation has received and is receiving.

The Senator from Wisconsin seems to think—perhaps I should say that if I have correctly understood him, the Senator from Wisconsin assumes—that subjects matter like this are within the domain of the Secretary of the Navy and of the Department of Justice. I deny it. The Navy Department had not even the excuse that its reserves were in jeopardy. It is true that many locations have been fraudulently made, and it is equally true that the Department of the Navy is directly concerned in the integrity of the naval reserves; but it is equally true also that the Department of Justice is interested in everything that concerns a violation of any of the laws of the United States, whether land laws or other laws, and in the administration of justice, no matter what department may be concerned, as it is equally true that the Secretary of the Navy has an interest in everything affecting the Navy, whether the particular thing falls within the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior or elsewhere. But does that give them jurisdiction over the affairs of that department? Does that justify such a meddling and a usurping practice? If so, then the Secretary of the Interior should be equally powerful. He should not only assert but exercise the power to interfere in naval affairs whenever a contract is made for a battleship or a bill presented to increase or diminish the marine forces. And the Secretary of War should take charge of the bill now pending and which is designed to distribute public lands to the units of the American Expeditionary Forces. Not only so, but the Secretary of the Interior should also exercise some of the functions of the Department of Justice, bringing suits himself against the violators of the land laws, regardless of the wish or the purpose of the Attorney General. And if these two high officials are authorized or justified in assuming the prerogatives of the Department of the Interior for any reason, then they are equally justified in assuming those of the Secretary of State or the Secretary of the Treasury, and per contra all of them have the same right to administer the affairs of the Interior Department whenever in their opinion their departments have concern, remote, direct, or contingent, in some of its affairs.

The result would be a confusion worse confounded than that which already exists between conflicting bureaus, commissions, and divisions.

If the Secretary of the Navy fears that the Interior Department is not protecting naval reserves which are carved from the public domain, his business is with the head of that department. If the Attorney General of the United States believes that by the enactment of a law, the execution of which is intrusted to the Interior Department, violators of the law will be protected and rewarded instead of being punished, then he should confer with the Secretary of the Interior, and, failing there, his appeal is to the President of the United States. But from the commencement to the end of all efforts to secure relief for those who under the prevailing law have acquired rights in the public domain, every step has been marked with the opposition sometimes open, frequently covert, of the Department of Justice and the Department of the Navy. I deny that the Secretary of the Interior is a man whose abilities or the lack of them, whose integrity or the lack of it, whose interest in the affairs of his office or the want of it, is such as to justify even remotely this most unprecedented and extraordinary usurpation of authority. If it is to be recognized and shall become a precedent, then I can conceive of no legislative step contemplated by the Congress of the United States affecting the Government in any way that may not be subject to the interference of or to control by any Cabinet officer who feels that his duty or the interests of his department require it. Of course that means chaos.

There is nothing in the situation which justifies these actions which have characterized, since 1915 and 1916, the attitude of the Navy and Justice Departments concerning this legislation. I do not deny the right or the duty of the Department of Justice to institute suits against violators of the law; but up to very recent times, even during the reign of Theodore Roosevelt, that department acted with regard to the affairs of other departments by the request of their heads or by the direction of the President; and even in those days the Secretary of the Navy was quite content to put his trust—and he was justified in doing so—in the capacity and the integrity of the Secretary of the Interior. I think the most deplorable aspect of this situation is the reflection it casts upon the capacity and the integrity of the Secretary of the Interior by these self-appointed custodians of its functions and authority.

This is not the first time, Mr. President, that I have had occasion so to express myself, and I do so with no desire to reflect unduly upon those who are self-implicated; but I have a right to complain that after yielding to the demands of the Secretary of the Navy, after referring the naval reserve bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, thus violating every precedent upon the subject, after strictly observing all of the conditions and reservations prescribed by everybody in the Department of Justice, and inserting them or eliminating them as directed, they should have revived their opposition to it, as they plainly did, through the letter written to the Senator from Virginia and telegram to the Hon. Gifford Pinchot, which the Senator from Wisconsin has read into the RECORD.

I shall violate no confidences knowingly, but I may say that the Senator from Virginia, like the honorable man that he is, never swerved from the assurance he gave to the friends of this measure that with the excision of the naval reserves from its recitals he would interpose no objection to the enactment of the bill.

Mr. President, the statements concerning the attitude of the heads of these departments, if I remember rightly, were made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and possibly by others. I recall him distinctly. He is not here; but I put it to my colleagues in this body whether the honorable Senator from Nevada, in charge of the bill during the last session of the Congress, would have announced the acquiescence of these officials in the terms of the conference report if the facts were not so?

I know about that time the opponents of the bill became unusually diligent, very active against it; and I have no doubt that pressure was brought to bear, perhaps through misconstruction of its possibilities, and these official gentlemen were persuaded to veer back to their old position, sit tight, and beat any legislation concerning the deposits of oil and gas upon the public domain. I will stand by my colleagues as to any statement which they make regarding such a subject, although it may appear unfounded because of an attitude subsequently assumed.

The Senator says that that bill, which he calls an iniquitous one—and I have no doubt he thinks it was—contained a damnable provision permitting a citizen of the United States to patent his property, and that it would have become a law but for his filibuster. As far as one may judge from the progress of this bill, the Senator two years from now may make the same boast regarding this bill. He is making a good start in that direction. But the feature of the bill he condemns was the best part of it. I contend that because a measure may bestow a right upon a corporation in common with citizens of the United States, both of whose rights should be recognized and protected, it should not be condemned.

The Senator and I are in accord in many things; perhaps in most things. But here we are wide asunder. I have seen my country grow and prosper under the operation of laws permitting citizens to discover and acquire mineral deposits upon the public domain. That policy has enriched the citizen and the public. These laws have been abused, as have all other laws, but nearly always by the connivance of a class of officials who, I believe, have long since disappeared from the departments.

I have no more use for the Standard Oil Co.—I do not think I have—than has the Senator from Wisconsin. I have no more use for a man who will violate the laws of his country and perpetrate a fraud upon its possessions than has the Senator from Wisconsin. Such a man should not only be denied the fruit of his effort but should be punished to the extent of the law; and this bill, with its predecessors, has been drawn with that end in view. Now, it will not always operate successfully.

The genius of man has never yet been able to frame the structure of a prohibitive statute so perfect in its operation as to be proof against the cunning and the unscrupulousness of men. Some one has said that equity might be well defined as an eternal race between the rogue and the chancellor, and legislation might well be included within the definition. We do not pretend that this law is bull proof and hog high; but we do believe that as far as prevision and earnest effort can make it possible this is as good a bill in its protective features as has been framed upon any subject within the consideration of the Congress.

I referred the other day to the act of 1872, under which the great Rocky Mountain region was populated and through the operation of which more than half a dozen States were given to the Republic. That bill condemns fraud and punishes crimes committed or attempted under it. The Department of the Interior prepared rules and regulations, which have been from time to time revised, for the protection of the honest locator and for the punishment of the dishonest locator, and yet many dishonest locations have been patented. Men have been able, notwithstanding these prohibitions, either to evade them, to jump through them, or otherwise disencumber themselves from their restrictive and penal provisions; but that is true of every penal law upon the statute books of every State in the Union. I might extend it to all the nations of the world. No legislation can be perfect. But who dares here advocate the repeal of that law?

I object to this bill, as I stated the other day, because it launches the Government of the United States upon an unexplored sea of landlordism, and is subject, in my opinion, to all of the objections that can be made to landlordism everywhere; but it is the best that we can get and is evidently far more than the Senator from Wisconsin is willing the people of the West shall have.

The Senator does not like the bill for reasons far different from mine. I do not like it principally because it is a leasing bill, and that is one of the features which he commends; but in view of the impossibility of securing any other than such a bill as this, its support becomes my duty, particularly to those constituents whom I know personally, honest men, against whose reputation no man can say a word, who have conscientiously tried to comply with all the requirements of the law and who have initiated valuable rights which they have vainly tried to perfect. It is in their interest and for their protection that we take the stone where bread should be their portion.

Mr. President, let me refer for a moment to the Senator's filibuster of the last session and his rather tart criticism of my comments upon it. I may say by way of preliminary that I have opposed filibustering ever since I have been in this body. I resorted to it once myself; I may do it again, but I told the Senate very candidly that I was doing it, and I did it in counteraction of its exercise by others against a very pressing measure.

We have in this body, unfortunately, no rule that can stop debate. If I want to do so, I can occupy the floor, now that I have it, and talk until I am physically and mentally exhausted, long before which everybody listening to me will have reached that condition. As a result two or three men determined to defeat a measure, however important, or to secure the enactment of an amendment upon some measure however obnoxious, can easily succeed by a common understanding to occupy the floor day and night and talk the Senate of the United States to death, or until the purpose is accomplished. With the exception of the first session which I attended, every Congress since then has passed away at the end of a long, miserable, unjustifiable filibuster, resulting in the defeat of legislation sometimes of the most supremely important character and justified upon the theory of necessity and to protect the interests of the people.

The last five or six days of the last session of Congress were occupied almost entirely by three Senators, of whom the Senator from Wisconsin was one and not the least conspicuous of the trio. The filibuster was not directed against the oil-leasing bill. That was its commencement. When the Senator having that bill in charge perceived that it was impossible to secure a vote upon it, he withdrew it. Then came the great supply bills, including a bill for the relief of the railways carrying something like $800,000,000. These Senators occupied the floor by day and by night, insisting whenever they referred to the pending bills at all that they were too important, too far-reaching, carrying billions of dollars, to be hurried through the expiring hours of the session; that the interests of the people demanded that they should be considered at great length; that they should be carefully and conscientiously examined; that every detail should be submitted to microscopic inspection lest the people should somewhere come to grief through cunningly contrived phraseology and other concealed snares lurking secure from the superficial gaze. I do not pretend to give the argument. Indeed, it is great courtesy to call anything said during a filibuster by the name of argument. It is talk, and the sole purpose is to consume time, wear down the endurance of the Senate, and set everything aside by the process of sheer obstruction. It is not a superdifficult task. A good pair of lungs and a vigorous physique are all the equipment required.

It so happened that during the first month, certainly during the first 45 days of the present Congress, and which, by the way, had to be called in special session because of that filibuster, Congress took up and enacted all these bills carrying the millions and billions of dollars. The railroad item in the deficiency appropriation bill carried $750,000,000. That bill was passed on June 12, on which day I submitted this comment to the Senate:

MR. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have no intention of opposing this bill. On the contrary, I shall vote for it with a great deal of pleasure. I rose, however, for the purpose of referring for a brief moment to the bill which has just been passed by the Senate without debate. It is the bill which appropriates $750,000,000 to enable the Government to meet the deficiency occasioned by its operation of the railroad systems of the United States. It was one of several large appropriation bills which had been reported from the committee and which were upon the calendar during the closing days of the last session. Those days were devoted to a general, indiscriminate, and long-continued discussion, ostensibly of one or more of the bills, but really of everything on earth except the substance of the bills. The reason assigned for their procedure at the time by gentlemen then occupying the attention of the Senate and the country was that these bills were of such transcendent importance that they involved questions and issues and considerations so vital to the welfare of the people of the country, with which they should be made acquainted in the fullest possible manner, that Senators were unable to square their conscience with their duty and permit those bills to pass without extended consideration. I note that the bill took just about five minutes for its presentation and passage to-day, and that not one of the Members of the Senate who were conspicuous in their opposition to the consideration and passage of these bills at the last session was present and in his seat at the time of the enactment of this great measure, carrying almost a billion dollars.

If my recollection serves me right not one of these filibustering Senators was present at the passage of either of the bills which they gassed to death in the public interest in the month of March, 1919.

That may be performing a public service—I am not capable of judging—but as far as I am capable of estimating its character, it does not appeal to me. I affirm that no filibuster ever carried on within these walls was justified or productive of any beneficial result. We had one in 1898, running for nearly six months, the subject being the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Silver Act. It passed ultimately and that filibuster did more to injure the cause of silver and to postpone its final rehabilitation than any other incident connected with the history of that great movement. Good legislation should never be thus obstructed and bad legislation will always recoil on its authors and destroy them.

The Senator says there is no reason for hastening this bill. Let us see. Congress has been in session since the 19th day of May. What have we accomplished? With the exception of the passage of the urgency supply bills we have done practically nothing except in committees. The committees have been very busy. We have confronting us the most important treaty that ever confronted any nation, railroad legislation, legislation affecting the cost of living, immigration, water power, revenue, a Military Establishment, and I might upon reflection cite a number of other measures. If we make the same progress between now and the 4th of March, 1921, we have made since the 19th day of May last, comparatively little of this important business will be crystallized into legislation. We have no time to spare on any of these matters.

We passed the oil-leasing bill in the last Congress in the month of February, 1918. The House did not pass it until 10 months thereafter. The committee of conference did not report it until very shortly before the Congress was to expire by limitation. That was not due to lack of effort upon the part of the conference committee nor to lack of interest in the subject. It was due to the opposition that the Senator is now manifesting to this bill.

The Senator has introduced a number of amendments, but, after talking for six hours, when he informed the Senate that he would yield the floor for about 15 or 20 minutes to refresh himself, and then would take it again, I can not recall that he has referred in terms to a single one of them. If that is the way this bill is to be discussed, if that is the sort of treatment it encounters at the threshold, how long will it take us to send it over to the House for its consideration? The Senator knows as well as we do that our action upon this bill is not conclusive. It must undergo the ordeal of a House investigation, where everything that is defective or supposed to be defective in it can be considered and remedied, where all its provisions will be examined in the very nature of things, notwithstanding the fact that it has been combed over and over again by the House committees in preceding Congresses.

No, Mr. President, we have not time to dally along with our mighty tasks. Unless we manifest more activity than we have so far exhibited, this Congress, like the last, will prove abortive, and a vast amount of extremely important legislation which the people ought to have, and ought to have had before this Congress came into existence, will knock at the doors of the next one. Every consideration appeals for urging the bill and expediting it as rapidly as the importance of the subject matter will permit.

Mr. President, I am ready to consider the amendments of the Senator from Wisconsin seriatim. They may be good, in whole or in part, or they may be objectionable, but I regret that the Senator did not prepare and suggest his amendments to the committee, where they might have been fully considered weeks ago, and thus saved this body much valuable time. Of course, I have no right—and if I did, I would not pretend to exercise it—to instruct the Senator from Wisconsin, who is an older legislator than I, what course he should pursue in regard to these matters.

When I am interested in a bill in committee I try to secure amendments, if desired, before the committee having the bill under consideration, where they receive much more attention than they are apt to receive here. Indeed, Mr. President, I can not take my seat without expressing my confidence in the Senate Committee on Public Lands. It is composed of excellent gentlemen, experienced legislators, every one of whom has conscientiously given his best work and thought to the bill which comes to us as the result of long-continued and earnest reflections. Let us enact this legislation or reject it, thus ending our consideration of the subject in some fashion, and turn our efforts in the direction of other equally insistent and equally important subjects clamoring for attention.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of making a reply to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. That would be a work of supererogation, because, in the first place, his long speech had no effect upon the Senate, as was evidenced by his own frequent complaint of the fact that Senators were not here, and, in the second place, because the speech itself is so long that nobody in or out of the Senate will ever read it.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a letter from Charles W. Eliot, lately printed in one of the New York papers. I need not tell any Senator who Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard College, is. He possesses one of the best native and one of the most highly trained intellects of any man in the United States. He is long-sighted, because he has been taught by abundant knowledge of the present status and the past history of the world to be long-sighted. He, too, if he chose, could say, "I am an American; I can not help it; and I remain an American," although he would not say it in that style, which is quite the style of the captain of the ship in comic opera of Pinafore.

I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD. It deals with the question of the covenant of peace for the nations of the world, and requests the Senate of the United States to ratify the treaty whether with or without interpretative resolutions, but at any rate to give the people peace and rest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHELAN in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PROMPT RATIFICATION WITH OR WITHOUT RESERVATIONS.

"On the 1st of July, 1919, I printed in the New York Times a statement about the covenant and treaty, over which the editor, not I, placed the following heading: 'It confers great benefits on the world and provides for its own perfecting.' I said in the first paragraph of this paper the treaty 'is by far the most promising agreement among the freer and more progressive nations that has ever been worked out.' The paper then enumerated several of the manifold and extraordinary merits of the document. For my present purpose I summarize these merits as follows: It rights great wrongs perpetrated by autocratic European governments in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. It sets on foot several new republics and makes free and safe populations that have endured for generations cruel oppression from alien autocratic governments. It proposes to create and maintain the first international legislative body, the first executive council with adequate powers, and the first international court with a sanction behind its decrees. It suggests the reduction of competitive national armaments. It contains many provisions for the improvement of the league itself and of the various institutions it establishes. To carry into execution the new policies the treaty embodies the league of nations which the covenant establishes is indispensable. It is the league that must maintain order and peace throughout the world while the new republics or constitutional monarchies set up in Europe and Asia are becoming stable and orderly and are gaining experience in self-government. It is the league which is gradually to provide an intelligent and righteous way of giving aid to the backward peoples of the earth and of protecting them from exploitation by any stronger power. It is the league which is to determine the admission of new members. Without the league the sacrifice America made in the war will have been in vain. With it the treasure spent and the young lives sacrificed will have earned an immense gain for mankind. It is the league which is to find a way to suppress militarism; that is, to annihilate the military class of professional soldiers who have no occupation except war and preparation for war.

"If the principles embodied in this treaty can be fairly applied and the instrumentalities it creates wisely developed, the welfare of humanity will be promoted to a degree unprecedented, and, indeed, quite beyond the scope of the human imagination. Its greatest beneficiaries will be the civilized nations which have through the war escaped from despotic rule. The free nations in Europe that have lived in constant fear of invasion by military despotisms will come next. Then the backward nations will reap lesser but enormous advantages. And, finally, America will be greatly benefited because genuine democracy will be made secure and increasingly influential throughout the world.

"In the American Senate certain objections are being urged against the ratification of this extraordinary treaty and covenant on grounds which look serious to some statesmen and Government officials, though not to the majority of them. These objections are based, first, on apprehension lest certain provisions in the treaty or covenant should limit the power of Congress to decide whether America should or should not take part in conflicts which may hereafter arise between nations in other parts of the world. To some minds these apprehensions seem reasonable and only prudent; to others they seem small-minded, mean-spirited, and faint-hearted. Another objection is the fear lest, under some unspecified passage in the treaty, the council of the proposed league might invalidate the American doctrine that foreign nations are not to establish on American soil colonies which remain subject to foreign Governments. Still another objection suggests that the council to be established under the covenant might possibly interfere with the settlement of purely American questions, such as immigration and tariff. Still another looks to a modification of the clause which provides for withdrawal from the league of nations on two years' notice by any member of the league. The Shantung objection seems to be no longer urged.

"On comparing these objections with the immense improvements in human welfare which the covenant and league propose to effect, it is manifest that the scope of the objections is minute compared with the immense possibilities of good for humanity contained in the covenant and treaty. If the allied and associated Governments that have made this covenant and treaty really desire to bring them into effect as promptly as possible—and there can be no doubt that they feel that desire very strongly—they will make no objection whatever to the adoption by the American Senate of all the reservations proposed. They will welcome the prompt ratification of the treaty with or without the reservations, and they would be incredibly dull of comprehension if they did not.

"The objectors to immediate ratification by the American Senate do not seem to have as much faith in the wisdom and morality of the American people in the future as the allied and associated powers have. The deeds of the United States since April, 1917, have completely convinced all the European powers that the American people can be relied on to interfere in an effective way in European contests, no matter on what scale the fighting may be or to which side victory inclines, if they think, as they did in 1917, that by interfering they can make this world, including America, a better place to live in. The European powers are perfectly satisfied that no American traditions of the eighteenth century, like that contained in the phrase "no entangling alliances," will prevent the American people from interfering in European or Asiatic conflicts, if they decide again, as they did in 1917, that they can promote liberty and justice in the world by fighting in Europe, Asia, or Africa. There is not a Government in Europe that is not fully persuaded that America will interfere again with like energy if she has similar reasons for interference. And, indeed, she will. What Americans hope is that similar reasons for interference will not recur, if the world learns to submit to the guidance of the proposed league of nations, improved or unimproved.

"Assuming as granted that the proposed reservations are not amendments or conditions, but only explanations or interpretations, I venture to suggest that it is the part of wisdom to ratify the covenant and treaty forthwith with or without the reservations proposed. What is desirable is that ratification should take place at Washington with the consent of all political parties and with an enthusiastic movement of national hope and expectation. Then the measures already proposed for reconstruction, rehabilitation, and amelioration of the severe conditions of the armistice can be immediately prosecuted with diligence and a calm mind; and in a few years, or even months, the production and trade of the world can be brought back to something like normal conditions. Then the effectiveness of the American democracy in war and in peace, in all our industry and social construction, will be seen and known of all men; and it will be quite unnecessary for American public men to keep shouting 'America first,' or 'I am an American.' Those praiseworthy sentiments will go without saying.

"It will be of great advantage for the United States to get the treaty and covenant ratified at once, to count the superb undertaking of April, 1917, as achieved, and settle down to the study of the new political and industrial problems which confront the Nation. It is nine months already since the armistice which settled the military issue. Can not the whole people now unite in adopting the only means of winning the fruits of that victory? Surely no partisan contests, personal animosities, or differences of contemporary judgment concerning the wisdom and character of the statesmen who have framed the treaty and covenant ought to prevent or delay the entry of the American people upon the new crusade for public liberty, justice, and happiness.

"CHARLES W. ELIOT.

"ASTICOU, ME., August 19."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an editorial from the New York World dated August 25, 1919, part of which I feel tempted to read, although I do not want to take up the time of the Senate at this moment, with the oil-leasing bill pending—a bill which has been delayed so long and so unjustifiably. It is headed "Two ways of making peace." I will read it:

TWO WAYS OF MAKING PEACE.

"By a vote of 9 to 8, which lined up all its Republican members except Mr. MCCUMBER, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has adopted an amendment to the Versailles treaty providing that former German rights in Shantung shall revert not to Japan but to China.

"Should the Senate follow the advice of its committee a grave affront will have been offered to Japan, our associate in the war with Germany, whose jealously-guarded honor is pledged to the restoration of Shantung. How disastrously that affront might affect international relations it would be superfluous to suggest to men with the experience in foreign affairs which Senators LODGE and KNOX have enjoyed.

"Yet this is but the beginning of mischief. The committee has invited the discontent of Europe, Asia, and Africa to come and be heard. Its door is open specifically to Irish, Greek, Egyptian, Lithuanian, Lettish, Ukrainian, and Esthonian champions. It can not consistently refuse to hear the Scottish national committee, seeking 'Scotland's right to self-determination.'"

I will stop reading long enough to say that I suppose that crowd of Scotchmen does not represent over about one man in one hundred thousand in Scotland. I continued the reading:

"It may reargue the delicate problems of Fiume, Danzig, the Banat of Temesvar, the Thracian Pomaks, Albania, Syria. It evidently intends to examine the right of the illiterate Egyptians to immediate self-government."

Not only that, I will stop reading long enough to say, Mr. President, but that certain American colored people have been before the committee this morning to argue the right of savage tribes in Africa to self-determination, and all that sort of thing; tribes that nobody contends to be anything but wild savages with breechclouts about them, and yet the committee has heard them. By the way, I want to say that there was more justification for hearing those American colored people concerning those of their race in Africa, in Togoland, and elsewhere than there was for hearing a great many of the others appearing before the committee.

But to continue with the reading, the article goes on:

"For trouble makers even the jump to India would not be long."

Why, Mr. President, I will stop reading long enough to say that almost before the ink got dry upon the editorial the "jump to India" had been made, for the committee has agreed to hear certain gentlemen representing themselves as being "representatives of the native population of India" who desire to present various things to the committee and who are to be heard while they present them. This is laughable when you consider that they are simply Hindus, and that if anything happens to put the Mohammedan, the Sikh, the Gurkha, and the other fighting races of India under the rule of Hindus there would be a "merry Christmas" in India, and a hot time in the old towns there.

I will say, by the way, I should not be a bit surprised if we heard Madagascar next. Madagascans can come before the committee very properly and say, "We were conquered by France; we never consented to become a part of the French Republic or under its sovereignty at all; and we ask that we be heard upon the question of our independence." It is true that the Madagascans are pure barbarians and pretend to no sort of civilization, except a very few who have been to French schools, who live in some of the cities, and have been employed by the French Government; but I suppose that may be the next leaf to be turned in this book of international farce.

What does it all mean, Mr. President? We meet for the purpose of concluding peace and to terminate the greatest war that the world ever saw and the Committee on Foreign Relations is sitting down and hearing what? A half dozen or more propositions to dismember the countries of our allies. This treaty dismembers Germany; it dismembers Austria-Hungary; it will dismember Turkey, because those countries were enemy territory and have suffered the fate of war by being overcome in war; but the American Senate Committee on Foreign Relations proposes, instead of considering solely the questions as to what shall become of the dismembered parts of our enemy countries, to consider the question of what shall become of the parts proposed or desired to be dismembered as parts of the countries of our victorious associates in war!

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. I do not see how the committee, having gone so far, can deny the right of the inhabitants of the Sahara Desert, of Tunis, and of Tripoli to be heard; likewise some of the American Indians; likewise Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands; likewise some of the sections of New York City that are inhabited exclusively by Russian Jews and some Italians and some other foreigners, some of whom are aliens and some of whom are not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And who profess allegiance to Trotski and Lenin.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Utah, I will say that he understands as well as I that probably the only reason those whom he has mentioned have not been heard is because they have not asked to be heard. To go on with this editorial:

"There are two ways in which a Senate of the United States might consider and decide upon the pending treaty of Versailles.

"One way would be to recognize it as imperfect in detail"—

I will stop to say that all human work is that—

"but as the direct route toward assured peace; as a settlement in which idealism had been obliged to compromise somewhat with previous bargains and present-day necessities, but had nevertheless triumphed on the whole. In such spirit a Senate might well accept it as the best obtainable, ratify it with or without interpretations helpfully intended to clarify its meaning, and hope with the rest of humanity for peaceful rearrangements under the league of nations.

"Another way would be to turn from the moving spectacle of a world in turmoil and torment in search of an 'issue' for 1920; to tear open healing wounds, undo difficult decisions, and encourage conflict; to affront our friends, bankrupt our customers, and stir up the red flames of anarchy; to throw the treaty into the discard and delay for more than a year the end of war, in the hope that the anguish of the world will somehow compel a new settlement not much worse than the present one—and in the certainty that, whether it does or not, the presidential election will in the meantime have been lost or won.

"With honorable exceptions, the Republicans in the United States Senate seem to have resolved upon the way of strife, bitterness, and political and financial chaos rather than the way of quick peace and the chance to rebuild prosperity. What have the people of the United States to say to such a choice? Between two ways of making peace, how will they make their preference plain?"

I have read that editorial, Mr. President, because I did not desire it to be published in the ordinary small print. I desired it published in large print, like the balance of my remarks, of which I make it a part. I apologize to the Senators in control of the pending bill for taking up even that much time. I confess that what I have put in was not apropos to the matter under present consideration, but there has been so much time wasted upon the bill that I did not know when I could come in if I waited until it was through with, and I thought that I would splice in what I had to say before the Senate got to a decision upon the bill, for fear I might not get it in to-day at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that there has been no objection to his putting articles daily into the RECORD even while this bill has been under consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I put the longer letter into the RECORD and read only the short editorial. My object in reading the short one was what I have stated. In inserting the longer I have been actuated by a desire not to delay the consideration of the pending bill.

Mr. SMOOT. There will be some more editorials to-morrow.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND PEACE TREATY.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Utah if he expects to finish the pending bill to-night?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that, in my opinion, it is very doubtful whether the bill will be concluded to-night.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I dislike very much to further trespass upon the patience of the Senator, who has spent so much time on the pending bill, and yet I desire to submit a few remarks on another subject, inasmuch as I am obliged to be away. I would refrain from doing so, however, if it would inconvenience the Senator or interfere with the bill he has in charge.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not object to the Senator speaking at this time if he is going to leave the city.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then, Mr. President, I shall submit my observations now, because I desire before I leave the city at least to inform my constituents as to my present view, and that very briefly, on the league of nations. I perhaps can find no better time when I could inflict less suffering upon the Senate than the present, while most Senators are absent from the Chamber.

Mr. President, owing to conditions which I have not been able to control, it has been impossible for me to be present during much of the consideration by the Senate of the peace treaty with Germany, improperly involved, as I think it is, with the league covenant, and unfortunately I find it is necessary for me to return to my home immediately, but before I go I have felt it was my duty to my colleagues and my constituents to express briefly my convictions and conclusions at this time upon one of the most momentous questions which have ever been before the United States Senate.

It is with great difficulty that I am able to determine what the treaty and league are and what their possible effects may be upon the world and especially upon my country. I have been deeply impressed with the fact that I am an humble Member of the Senate, which is one of the two branches of the treaty-making power of our Government. I realize the fact that I have taken a solemn oath to perform my public duty without evasion and with an eye single to the welfare of our Republic. I was elected a Senator from the State of Michigan to represent that State as an integral part of the United States of America. It was known that the interests of the United States were more or less involved in the affairs of the world, but it was never suggested until within the last year that the President and Senators were expected to establish and maintain monarchies on the Eastern Continent, to administer foreign Governments, or to become parties to international intrigues. The people had not heard of this proposal when the present Senate and the President were elected. Indeed, President Wilson was elected on the distinct issue—and upon that alone—that he was against the war, and he assured the country that he had not only kept us out of it but that he would continue to keep us out of it, and the clear inference was that he was opposed to engaging by the United States in European affairs. Neither the President nor the Congress had received any mandate from the people to surrender any of their country's rights or sovereignty in exchange for the right to meddle with the Governments of the Old World.

I have felt that the President has treated the Senate and the country unfairly in handling this great question, but I am not now conscious of any personal antagonism or political bias. I am only anxious to know what is best for our Republic, and what may happen to me or my party through any conscientious act of mine in reference to this matter does not control me. I have felt and still feel that the United States should do what it properly can consistent with its greatest present and future usefulness to render impossible another such a world calamity as that through which we are now passing. I confess, however, that I am impressed with the thought that my first duty lies with my country. I know that that country is the hope of the world. If it is destroyed or materially weakened, that hope is blasted. Without thought of gain or desire of conquest, the United States entered the European war primarily for self-protection and secondarily to preserve civilization against armed autocracy. History records no similar example of sacrifice and devotion to principle, and if it could have been possible after we had saved Europe and removed the menace to our own country for us to have retired from the Eastern Hemisphere I would have been much better satisfied than I am to-day. I realize, however, that, being a party to the war against Germany, it probably was necessary for us to assist in making the treaty of peace. The United States could have made a separate peace with Germany; and it would have been better for us if this had been done, rather than to have been involved as the pending treaty involves us. I do not believe it was necessary for us to become so entangled in the affairs of the Old World as to make it necessary for us to stand sponsor not alone for the peace of the world, but for the maintenance and stability of foreign governments whose normal state is revolution.

The President, however, was practically our sole representative at the peace conference, and he neogtiated the present treaty with its league covenant. I should have mentioned the league first, for the peace treaty was not only secondarily considered, but it was evidently considered of secondary importance. For seven months he negotiated with representatives of the Allies, and it has been disclosed that his principal object was to establish a league of nations, and to obtain this, not as he had planned it but as others had forced it upon him, he consented to do things which he admits are not right but to which he asks the consent of the Senate.

The Senate has been considering the matter for something over two months and has been obliged to work very much in the dark. Even now all the facts have not been disclosed, although most of them are in the possession of the President. There are a few which even he does not know yet. Treaties with Austria, Hungary, Turkey, and probably other nations are now being negotiated at Paris. The treaty before the Senate is involved, or will be, in these other treaties, and yet the Senate is criticized because it does not like to play blindman's buff with a matter of such transcendent importance as a proposition completely to change the American policy which has maintained for more than a hundred years, and under which this Republic has become the greatest, most progressive, and most powerful in the world.

I have refrained hitherto from making statements on the floor of the Senate concerning this matter, even when I have been present and tempted, because I confess that I have been trying to find out the truth, and the whole of it, before I spoke. Now, however, many things have been disclosed and they have made my duty more clear. I now find that practically all of the great and high principles for which the President contended prior to his trip to Paris have been abandoned. The publicity which we were promised, and which we had a right to expect, was not experienced. The principle of self-determination of small nations was abandoned. The assurance that the United States would not be involved in international alliances was not realized, and, from the statements of the President and his Secretary of State, it is discovered that our representatives to the conference were overreached and deceived. The President said, however, if I remember his statements correctly at the recent White House conference, that the understandings of certain Senators as to how the treaty should read are already included in the purpose and intent of the treaty itself. He bases this statement on the fact that he has a verbal understanding with those nations who withheld facts from him to the effect that such is indeed the understanding of the conference. As for myself, sir, I must have that understanding in writing. I can not consent that my country must either enter into future engagements which would be contrary to the best interests and to the desire of this Republic, when the occasion arose, or else be accused of infidelity to its treaty obligations. This agreement proposes that we shall give everything and receive nothing. There is, in fact, nothing which the Allies can give us that we need or want, and it seems to me to be foolish and most unwise to enter into a unilateral contract to furnish the men and the money to keep the peace of the world, preserve the possessions obtained by conquest, and to maintain the boundaries of the nations of the Eastern Continent in exchange for their protection, which we do not need and which they can not give. Inasmuch as we ask for and get nothing, inasmuch as our help will be gratuitous and unselfish, and no contract to that effect is necessary to convince the world of the fact, it seems unwise and unnecessary for us to enter into this complicated, confused, and confusing agreement to do what the advocates of the bargain believe we would do anyway if it was right that we should. I realize, of course, that the United States at any future time could, with practical impunity, break this agreement, and if the treaty as written is adopted the United States will break it if called upon to send our boys and treasure to maintain an existing monarchy in the Orient or to preserve some of the territorial possessions obtained by force and intrigue and validated by the pending treaty; but when the United States breaks the treaty for any cause the other signatories, or some of them, will condemn her as being faithless to her international obligations, and thus, to some extent at least, will she lose that world respect and confidence which is her greatest power for good to-day.

I do not care to discuss the question of the differences between legal and moral obligations. They are both the same to me, unless by a written statement made as a part of the treaty it is clearly defined that the extent of our moral obligations would be determined by the circumstances of every case as it arises. We are pledged in this treaty to maintain a standing army in Europe for at least 15 years, and he indeed would be exceedingly blind who could not even now see the necessity of maintaining our troops in the Eastern Hemisphere indefinitely. These troops will be composed of American boys taken from American homes. Something other than hazy dreams or untried theories should form the foundation for such a sacrifice. We are to be linked up with a league of more than 30 nations, of which not more than one besides the United States is unquestionably solvent. If trouble occurs in Europe, which under the league and the treaty the United States is bound to enter, our Government must settle the trouble and pay the bills, even though a majority of its men are sacrificed and its whole treasure is exhausted, for morally we can not turn back or surrender when we enter the contract. In a partnership each partner is responsible for all obligations of the firm. Do you think the people understand this? Are Senators wrong in explaining these facts to them? I can not consent that my country shall enter into such a firm where the liabilities are so great and the possible rewards so uncertain unless the people who constitute the country, furnish the boys, and provide the money understand the true conditions and command me to sign the papers.

I regret that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has seen fit to amend the treaty in the Shantung matter, not that an unconscionable wrong is not done to China under the treaty, for it has, but I am anxious to relieve the United States from any responsibility or liability in the distribution of the spoils of war among the Allies. I would like to place such reservations in the instrument as clearly to relieve us from any part in this unrighteous job. I am not willing, therefore, to assume the position of dictating how these spoils shall be distributed. Let those nations who have profited by the plunder be responsible. The Shantung matter is not less reprehensible than others contained in the treaty, and I do not care to make any invidious distinctions. I would gladly wash our hands of all of them.

I am fearful that even if this treaty were properly reserved, that is, as properly as it can be under its present construction, it will not contribute to the peace of the world. I am fearful that under any circumstances it will be provocative of trouble. It clearly results in establishing and preserving the balance-of-power principle; and the President prior to his visit to Europe said that that was one of the evils which must be destroyed.

It seems to me that from the very nature of things the league will compel the establishment of other leagues for self-protection, and the selfishness which has been manifested in the distribution of territory and which will still further be manifested in the distribution of the larger territory of Austria, Hungary, and Turkey, can only bear one kind of fruit, and that will be the Dead Sea variety to the hopes of those who are anxiously looking for the peace of the world. I am very desirous that the United States, which went into the war clean, shall come out in the same condition. The treaty and its attached league prevent the possibility of this if it is adopted as presented to the Senate.

I realize that all right-thinking men and women in the world are anxious for something to come out of this war which will make for peace. They have suffered and sacrificed so much that very many of them have been willing to accept any proposition labeled "Peace," almost without reading or understanding it. The label, however, does not necessarily properly identify the contents. We do not change the nature of the thistle by calling it a lily. We should understand what the probable results of any proposed treaty are before we adopt it. I am so thoroughly convinced of the reasonable possibilities for irreparable injury to my country under the treaty as presented to us that I can not, under my oath of office and my conscientious convictions, vote for it unless it is made clear by reservations, if such can be made, or by amendments, if necessary, that we engage only to do things which we believe are for the good of the world and not detrimental to our country. If we remain aloof from international complications and properly solve the problems of this Republic, we will be the one hope of a world looking and longing for peace. If we involve ourselves with all the Bolshevist, monarchial, revolutionary, territory-grabbing nations of the Old World, we will not only be unable to help them but we may destroy ourselves. Our obligations to engage in any European or Oriental war or disturbance must depend entirely upon the action of the Congress which is in session when it is proposed that we shall participate in such difficulty. I can not support the treaty unless in unequivocal and clear language we reserve from the consideration by the league of nations or the supreme council all questions affecting the internal policies of the United States. No verbal understanding or expressions of doubtful construction will meet with my approval, and what I say of internal policies I say of the Monroe doctrine. No convention representing monarchies or other alien nations shall have the right even to discuss whether this doctrine is a "regional understanding" or purely an American policy. That question must be left unembarrassed to the United States.

I want no strings, either moral or legal, attached to our withdrawal from the league. I know that my country will be faithful to all of its obligations, and the very suggestion that a council of aliens shall determine whether we have fulfilled our obligations, not only to the league but to all other nations of the world, is offensive to me. I could well wish that a simple and yet effective covenant could have been drawn whereby all its signatories could have agreed to submit justiciable questions to arbitration and to refrain from war where possible until its causes and necessity could be passed upon by the conscience of the world. I want the United States to make the meaningful statement that inasmuch as it is receiving nothing from Europe, Asia, and Africa, and believes in representative democracy and self-determination of peoples, it can not and will not assist in forcibly transferring peoples and their territory to other governments, and then agree to maintain these enlarged boundaries perpetually against external aggression. It would have been sufficient for the United States to have pointed to its unselfish attitude in this war in order to impress the world, and especially every offending nation, with the fact that what it had done it would do again if duty demanded. The President has gone too far.

Now, under this treaty we will be subject to all the danger of intrigue, and even as the President was imposed upon in the secret treaty between Japan and her allies, England, France, and Italy, so might he or some other representative of our Government be imposed upon again. He believed that this secret treaty was wrong, but thinks it is necessary to accept it now in order to carry out his plan for a league, and to purchase the support of Japan, and I am inclined to think he was right. But friendship and support purchased under such conditions and at such a price are liabilities instead of assets. The trouble arises through the involvement of the United States in European complications and intrigues. We should remove ourselves from that position. I think we can do it by proper reservations. If, as the President states, those reservations are now understood by the league covenantors, they will be adopted without delay. If, however, notwithstanding the President's statement, that "what I propose is the mutual understanding of the parties to the league," they hesitate and quibble, it will be conclusive evidence to me that they have secret understandings which will be disturbed by a clear and unquestionable statement of the obligations which the United States assumes.

I have stated that the document now under consideration by the Senate is not clear, even to the best minds in the country. I know of no two wise and thoughtful men, advocates of the treaty, who agree as to the meaning of all of its provisions. Equally honest and capable men who oppose it also differ in their construction of its terms. All will agree, however, that the possibilities under its operation are of the greatest importance to our country and to the world. They agree that it means a complete change of the traditional policies of the United States, and yet impatience is manifested on the part of the President, his blind followers, and many men and organizations throughout the country at the time and discussion which the Senate is devoting to this subject. Will any man deny, however, that the discussion which has thus far occurred has changed public sentiment? Can anyone doubt that the people were entirely ignorant of the real things which the treaty contained, and that as they become better informed they counsel caution? My mail is not different, I imagine, from that which is received by other Senators.

The great majority of the letters which now come to me are against the consent of the Senate to this treaty as it now stands. Their impulses are all for peace, but they are now wondering whether what is proposed necessarily will accomplish that desirable end. When the people understand this treaty it is the duty of the Senate to listen attentively to their advice and to follow it if they can conscientiously. It is my belief, however, that the people of Michigan believe that I ought at least to understand the situation better than they, and they expect me to act in accordance with my own best judgment as to what is good for our common country. They want the United States to play as large a part as it properly ought to do in this New World, but they are opposed to a blind and useless sacrifice of our national policies and ideals to a theoretical scheme which the best thought of the world believes is full of danger.

I regret exceedingly that the President saw fit to involve the peace treaty with Germany in all the doubts and dangers of a league to enforce peace. I know he felt that there was an opportunity to carry out some of his ideas by involving them as inextricably as possible with the peace treaty. He evidently felt that he might not succeed with a league which was obliged "to stand upon its own bottom." On his way to Europe the second time he made a speech in New York in which he said he proposed to weave the league into the treaty in such a manner that the Senate could not unravel it. I am not quoting his words, but think I am stating his sentiment correctly. He evidently expected to do what he has done, namely, coerce the Senate into precipitate action by appealing to the people on the ground that the Senate's action was delaying peace and continuing industrial disturbance. I am sorry that he took this course, because it is unworthy of the President of a great Republic whose very life may be involved in this complicated treaty. I am willing, however, so far as I am concerned, to assume the responsibility of acting for what I believe to be the highest interests of my country, whatever the political result may be upon me or whatever the temporary effect may be upon the business of this Republic.

Even now, after weeks of study, I am not clear in my own mind as to all of the provisions of this document, and I feel confident that a large number of Senators are in the same condition as I am. I had read the provision of the covenant relating to labor and did not thoroughly understand it, but I thought it was intended as a political sop to labor and not fraught with danger. But I listened to the speech of the senior Senator from Colorado on this subject with interest, as I always do listen to him, for he is a great and honest lawyer and always possessed of the courage of his convictions, and I shall try to go over the matter again before I am called upon to vote upon it. If I believe its adoption will be detrimental to labor or to our country, I shall vote against it. If called upon to vote upon this treaty before I have cleared every doubt, I shall resolve it in favor of the United States, which I am sworn to maintain and uphold, and to which with all my heart and soul I yield my undivided allegiance and support.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have every reason to believe that we can get a vote on this bill to-morrow, and for that reason I am not going to ask the Senator from Wisconsin to proceed to-night. I therefore move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. OVERMAN. I had an understanding day before yesterday that we would have an executive session yesterday; and the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], known as the Republican whip, agreed that no matter what happened we would have an executive session this afternoon. I think, therefore, the Senator from Utah ought to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] came to the Senate to-day, and he and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] had some understanding. They are both away from the Senate now. The Senator from New Jersey went away, and he is not in his office, nor is the Senator from Montana in his office. I want to say to the Senator from North Carolina that there is no intention whatever of delaying the confirmation of Mr. Palmer, but I do think the Senator from Montana and the Senator from New Jersey ought to be here.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not want to take any advantage of these Senators if they had an understanding that the matter would be postponed.

Mr. SMOOT. I do know that they talked together to-day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to have unanimous consent, however, that there will be an executive session to-morrow afternoon at not later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to say to the Senator now, in the open, that just as soon as this bill is voted upon to-morrow the Senate can go into executive session.

Mr. OVERMAN. The question is whether this bill will be voted upon to-morrow or not.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there is any doubt but that it will be voted upon to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think that it will be voted upon to-morrow?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the Senator from North Carolina for a moment thinks I would make that statement unless I had some basis for it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have very great respect for the Senator, but I did not know who was going to delay the matter. You can not tell how matters are delayed. I think there ought to be an executive session held soon, and I should like to have unanimous consent that there will be an executive session held to-morrow afternoon at not later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. That might be just the time we would be about to vote upon the bill; and I would not like at that time to go into executive session under such conditions.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not want to interfere with the Senator's bill at all, but I want to have some understanding. We have had one understanding or two understandings that there would be an executive session.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], I am quite sure, understood that there would not be an executive session to-day, because he has left the Senate, too; and I do not think the one day will make any difference.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think, from what a page tells me, that there must have been some understanding such as the Senator suggests between the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Montana; but I shall insist every day now on an executive session.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will not find me opposing it, but I do not want to say positively that there was an agreement. I saw the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] talking to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and I do know that the Senator from New Jersey came over to this side and said he was going to leave and we would have an executive session to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall ask for an executive session to-morrow. I give notice now so that it may be understood that I shall press for an executive session to-morrow afternoon. If there was such an understanding I do not want to take advantage of anyone.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senator does not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that, of course, we are not doing very much business in the Senate and have not for some months. So far as I am concerned, I have not any objection to an understanding of Senators being carried out, but this is the second day when it has been understood that we were going to have an executive session between Senators who are supposed to represent the other side of the Chamber as the titular leaders and Senators on this side who are interested.

It seems to me that in the orderly conduct of the business of the Senate there is no reason why Senators should not be kept here to transact business in which they are interested. Of course, we are all interested in different things, but when it is understood that business in which Senators are interested is coming before the Senate, two particular Senators can not go off in a corner and reach an understanding that will stop the entire machinery of the Senate from grinding. Really I do not think there is any understanding or agreement between the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Montana. I saw the Senator from New Jersey in the Chamber within the hour. I have no doubt he is in town, and I think he is capable of being here. There are a number of nominations upon the Executive Calendar that should be passed on. If there is a fight on them or any disposition not to dispose of them, we can find that out when we get an executive session; but, of course, the matter can go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I telephoned to the office of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and was informed that he was not there. I have taken particular interest in trying to locate him somewhere, and I can not do it. I also telephoned to the office of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and I was told that he had left the office.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me ask a question, if the Senator will allow me. Of course I do not want to interrogate the Senator, but does he assert that either of the Senators has informed anybody in the Senate, including himself, that there was any agreement? In fact, he said he did not know there was any agreement made between the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Montana, but he suspects there has been an agreement made between them, and therefore we should not have an executive session.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator the basis I have for that statement is that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr.

FRELINGHUYSEN] asked me whether I was going to yield for an executive session; and if so, at what time. I told him I did not want to yield until the bill was passed, and that if it was passed to-day we would hold an executive session. He then said to me that he would go over and talk to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and see if they could not arrive at some understanding about the executive session. I do not know whether they arrived at that understanding, but I do know that both of them have left the Senate Chamber.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is customary very often in the Senate to yield public business to the convenience of some Senator; we do it all the time, and this may not be an exception to the rule; but I think this is the first time I have ever heard of the Senate stopping the wheels of business because it is suspected that some Senator wanted to do something. I have no objection to the matter going over until to-morrow. It is not so urgent as that, but for two afternoons——

Mr. THOMAS. That is a very serious suspicion to entertain against the Senators.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Assuredly. I agree with the Senator. A charge of that kind ought not to be brought to their door, especially at this time. I hope we can reach an executive session to-morrow afternoon. Senators on this side of the Chamber reached an agreement with the leaders on the other side of the Chamber in the customary way to transact this business, and Members of the Senate have waited patiently all day for an opportunity to attend to the business in executive session. Now, when the time for the executive session comes, we are going to adjourn because we suspect that two Senators have reached an agreement. I think the time has come when we should act. I am not going to interfere with our adjournment, letting the matter go over until to-morrow, but I think we are entitled to have an assurance that we are going to have an executive session when to-morrow comes.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, August 29, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 28, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, help us, we beseech Thee, to concentrate our minds for the moment upon the things eternal, that we may be the better prepared to take up the things of the now and advance the civilization of the world to larger, nobler conditions which shall make life stronger, better, purer. In Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2883. An act authorizing the Meridian Highway Bridge Co., a corporation, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges and approaches thereto across the Missouri River between Yankton County, S. Dak., and Cedar County, Nebr.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence, by unanimous consent, was granted, as follows:

To Mr. JAMES, for the balance of the week, on account of sickness.

To Mr. MCARTHUR, for 30 days, for the purpose of accompanying the Secretary of the Navy and Admirals Parks and McKean on their trip of inspection to the Columbia River.

The SPEAKER. On this call 240 Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order to-day the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] is recognized to address the House for 30 minutes.

THE WAR.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, we have just passed through the greatest war in the world's history. As a result of that war, never before has there been such social, economic, and financial upheaval.

Our country was indeed fortunate to emerge from that struggle with a record for valor and accomplishment unparalleled throughout the annals of all time and at a minimum cost of human life, as compared with other countries which participated in that war. [Applause.]

While it is true that the United States is the only country which came out of that great conflict stronger and more powerful in every way than when she entered, yet to-day upon her bosom are found many scars, some of which thus far are unhealed.

Aside from the irreparable loss of the brave manhood who perished on the field of battle and in the hospitals; the immense amount of treasure expended; the taxes which of necessity were levied; the bonded indebtedness upon which over a billion dollars will be required to meet the interest alone; the governmental activities in taking over the various industrial, public-service, and utility corporations; the determination as to what kind of an Army and Navy we may need in the future; all remind us that confronting us lie the problems of almost a world-wide reconstruction.

I indulged in the vain hope that we might proceed to the solution of these problems so vital to the interest of our country without our efforts being hampered by a narrow and selfish partisanship, which throughout every stage of the Democratic administration, not even excepting the period of the war, has marked the conduct of so many Republican Members of this House.

From the moment Congress declared that a state of war existed between the United States and Germany until to-day, no partisan expression on the floor of this House has issued from my lips. During the long weeks and months consumed by the Ways and Means Committee in raising billions of dollars to successfully carry on the war the minority Members were welcomed in our midst and no partisanship of any kind or character ever crept into our proceedings.

The President of the United States called into his counsel the leading men of the Republican Party and the administration tried in every way to make common cause against a common enemy. I would be untrue to myself as well as to you if I did not state in this connection that many of these Republicans, with an eye single to the interests of our country, gave the best that was in them to that cause.

But all the time in this House our efforts here were hampered and obstructed by a partisanship which in its intensity at times threatened to place the love of party above the welfare of country.

Now that the war is over we find that, swollen with the conceit of a brief period of temporary power, partisanship on your side of the House reigns supreme, and many Republican Members are intolerable in their continued denunciation of Democratic extravagance, Democratic incompetency, and Democratic inefficiency.

Continually harping on the inefficieny of others comes with a bad grace from a political party which could not even perfect its own organization in this House without calling in several Republican Senators and the chairman of the Republican national executive committee, who dictated to you what you should do and who organized this House. [Applause.]

The Republican filibuster in the Senate deprived for several months the wives and widows and mothers of our soldiers of the allotments given by a Democratic administration and allowed by a Democratic House. At last, in response to an insistent demand from these widows and mothers and wives, a Republican appropriation committee finally reported a bill to give them these allotments which should have been paid to them long ago. Notwithstanding that for months the Republican filibuster had kept these dependent ones of our soldiers out of their money and the bill was reported and on the Speaker's table, yet the chairman of the Appropriation Committee refused to call up the bill and asked for more time and more delay. And when we on this side protested against a further denial of the rights of our soldiers' widows and mothers and wives we were answered not with reasons nor excuses for the delay but by an arrogant motion from the Republican floor leader to adjourn.

You Republicans talk about incompetency and inefficiency. You have a majority of nearly 50 in this House, and every Republican present voted to adjourn and further delay the payment of these allotments; yet there were so many of you efficient Republicans absent that the Democrats defeated the motion to adjourn, and the Democratic leader, Mr. CLARK, taking the place of the Republican chairman of the committee, took the bill from the Speaker's table, where you wanted it to remain, and it was passed in less than an hour. [Applause.]

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], when he was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, passed a bill through this House last session in 11 minutes, and every Member on both sides voted for it. It was sent to the Senate and died by reason of the Republican filibuster. The Republican chairman of the Ways and Means Committee brought in the same identical bill, without the changing of the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." What happened? Debate lasted all day, and the same bill, every one of you Republicans and Democrats voted for and passed through the House last session in 11 minutes, has never yet been voted on, but was lost for weeks somewhere on the Speaker's table.

Why, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] would stop all the functions of the Federal Government and go to investigating everything, because he heard that a carpenter in Cincinnati had his wages raised by the War Department from $15 to $75 a week. But there is nothing unusual in this, for highly efficient Republicans are always willing to stop anything or everything to investigate any raise of a poor man's wages, but no one ever heard of them ever wanting to investigate the millions of dollars of the people's money they have turned over in tariff rates to the trusts and combines and manufacturing monopolies in exchange for campaign contributions. [Applause.]

Some time ago the Republican chairman of the Appropriations Committee told this House that there was an absolutely indefensible hospital item in the sundry civil bill that would be a loss to the Treasury of $1,500,000. The Secretary of the Treasury also told us that the expenditure of this sum would be useless extravagance, as there were hundreds of empty beds in the hospitals and there was more room now than the soldiers needed. Yet when it appears that the only way this indefensible item can be removed from the bill would be to refuse to concur in the Senate amendment and force the Senate to recede, or else by a special rule so modify the amendment that the $1,500,000 might not be a total loss, the chairman of the committee, Mr. GOOD, insisted that we concur in an amendment which, according to his statement and according to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, is a total loss of $1,500,000 to the taxpayers of this country. When we demanded the other alternative, the bringing in of a rule, it developed that this can not be done, because the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], a member of the Rules Committee, is absent making Republican speeches [applause], and there are other Republican members of the committee absent, and a quorum of this committee can not be secured. So the House, over Democratic protest, concurred in the Senate amendment.

The Republican Members of this House love to talk about the high prices which are now prevailing, and they say they are the result of Democratic extravagance. But I do not see how the Democrats can be responsible for the American people having to pay $1,500,000 for two or three Republican speeches made by the chairman of the Republican congressional executive committee, Mr. FESS. And in spite of the high prices which are now prevailing, I trust I will not be offensive when I express the opinion that, as wonderful an orator as the hysterical gentleman from Ohio is, the history of no Democratic administration will ever show where so much was paid and so little was received.

The Republican Party has often been compared to the Bourbons because they never learn anything by experience. There never was a more helpless and bewildered political party in the history of the Republic than that party is to-day. They are preaching progressive policies but practicing the same old reactionary measures. With the exception perhaps of one or two chairmen, every leader they have in this House and every near leader belongs to the old reactionary crowd of stand-pat Republicans, whose policies were repudiated by the American people eight years ago, and before they had been in power 30 days they returned to those practices which drove them from office a short time ago.

In the good old Republican days of a few years back, the days of gag rule, stifling debate, counting in a quorum, and the Speaker taking a member off the committee if he didn't vote to suit him, the minority was always allowed a fair representation on a partisan investigating committee, and never treated as the Democrats have repeatedly been treated when the Rules Committee brought in the gag rule on the investigation of the War Department.

In those days, bad as they were, no partisan measure was ever adopted by the Republican majority without at least giving the minority an opportunity to vote on the question in the committee. There was often no opportunity for discussion, but Mr. Speaker Reed, and Mr. Speaker Henderson, and Mr. Speaker CANNON, and the Republican membership always permitted the minority to be present at the committee and vote when the final vote was taken. The worst days of Cannonism or Reedism never denied us this. But now the Democrats are not even called in to the committee when the final vote is taken, and the first knowledge the Democratic members of the committee have of the ex parte proceedings of a committee report to investigate one of the great bureaus of this Government is when the gentleman from Kansas presents the rule which shuts off debate, prevents amendment, and upon which the previous question is ordered.

A new order of Republicanism, where the Speaker of the House stands behind the Chaplain and dictates to him what prayers and what petitions shall or shall not be sent to the throne of Almighty God.

It is, indeed, a new order of Republicanism which for the first time in the history of the Republic censures the prayers of the Chaplain, a Chaplain who has been with us for over 24 years, and who was praying to bring about a condition for peace on earth and good will to men.

We should, however, feel grateful in that so far there has been no attempt made to refuse to permit us to sit in the House and answer to our names when the roll is called.

The sensational gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], and the genial gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] and the hysterical gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] love to charge the Democratic Party with extravagance and inefficiency and incompetency, when if they do not know, they surely ought to know, that the present Democratic administration has not only repealed much of the mischievous Republican legislation, but at the same time has enacted into law more real substantial legislation than the Republican Party has in its entire history, and much of this remedial legislation were the redemptions of many broken Republican promises.

For years you ignored the demand that United States Senators should be elected by a popular vote of the people. We crystallized this demand into law.

For 50 years the American people have been longing for an income-tax law whereby the wealth of this country should pay its proportionate share of the burdens of government. During all those years they looked in vain to the Republican Party, for that party has never believed that the wealth of the country should ever contribute anything but Republican campaign contributions. Had it not been for the Democratic income-tax law it would have been impossible to have raised the money by taxation necessary to meet the expenses of the war.

We reduced the indefensible and prohibitive rates of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law. As to the success of the Underwood bill, we have but to point you to the reflection of the thousands of furnace fires blushing red against the skies over every industrial center in this country.

The Democratic administration has done more for labor than the Republican Party has ever done. We created the Department of Labor; we gave labor an eight-hour law, and as much as you would have liked to, not one of you dared to vote against it. We gave labor an anti-injunction law, and only 31 of you voted against it, and yet for 50 years you refused to give this legislation to labor.

Every four years the Republican Party in convention assembled would solemnly promise the American people that it would repeal the clumsy, antiquated system of currency then in operation throughout the United States—a system which in time of stress always failed to give relief, and which in the past so often failed to prevent financial panics, which paralyzed industry, destroyed commerce, and left ruin, failure, and disaster in its wake. The Democrats replaced the antiquated currency laws with a sound economic system of currency reform without which it would have been impossible to have financed the war.

The Republican Party often promised the farmer a rural credits act, but all it ever gave him was a tax on agricultural products, which was nothing but a flimsy pretext to console him for the millions of dollars wrung from his pockets every year by the plundering hand of a tariff.

I could go on for hours reviewing the real substantial legislation enacted by the Democratic administration—an antitrust law, a Federal Trade Commission, a Tariff Board, a child-labor law, and many other wholesome laws looking to the general welfare of the American people—laws many of which were promised by you, but shamelessly denied.

The Republicans voted for nearly all of the great war measures which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] now so bitterly denounce, though both of them voted for the very measures they are denouncing.

Why, the meek and lowly gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] grew hysterical in his frenzied opposition to a hospital for our sick soldiers when he found it was intended to be built in a Southern State.

The genial gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] nearly choked with indignation when he discovered that, by reason of natural advantages, a nitrate plant was erected in the South.

My good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has almost developed into a common scold lecturing us on Democratic extravagance in passing bills which he himself voted for. And in this connection I wish to say that there is no Member of this body who has dug oftener or deeper or more effectively in the Public Treasury securing appropriations for the Delaware River and his impossible canals.

When some measure advocated by the President of the United States and backed by the unanimous approval of the American people would be brought up in the House, you on the Republican side were the first to clamor for a roll call so you could put yourselves on record in support of the measure. But what was the record of many of you when you had a chance to obstruct the Democratic administration in the conduct of the war on matters equally important but yet not featured in newspaper headlines, and you could safely oppose them without material injury to yourselves?

When the Huns were almost in sight of Paris and the line of the Allies was being slowly but surely pushed back, the eyes of all Christendom were turned imploringly toward America for aid. Like a devastating scourge the great German war machine was sweeping on, and if our forces did not get there in time to stem the red tide of German fire and blood and steel all that the Allies had gained during the war might be lost. Yet there was much we had to do.

We had to raise, train, and equip 4,000,000 soldiers. We had to provide the machinery for the raising of these soldiers. We had to create the War Risk Bureau so the dependent ones of our soldiers could be protected in their absence. We had to create an insurance department. We had to take over railroad and telegraph and telephone lines. We had to build factories and arsenals to manufacture and store guns and ammunition and explosive shells and all kinds of munitions of war. We had to build camps to take care of these soldiers. We had to build vessels to carry them across the seas. We had to raise nearly $30,000,000,000. We had to create numerous bureaus to take care of the various war activities—the War Labor Board, the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the Food Administration, the Fuel Administration, the War Industries Board, the War Finance Corporation, and many others.

We had to provide places where these thousands of civilian employees of these bureaus and the thousands of new civilian employees of the tremendously increased business of the Quartermaster Department, the Adjutant General's Office, the Ordnance Department, and the Navy Department could attend to their duties. All this, and much more, we had to do before we could send our soldiers across the seas to face the Hun. And all the time this great work was going on, work which dazzled the world in the magnitude of the undertaking, in the rapidity of its dispatch, and in the splendor of its accomplishment, the Huns were still drawing nearer to Paris.

Once Paris was in German hands our task would be increased a hundredfold, yet notwithstanding the imperative need of haste and the feverish activity in all war preparations throughout these various bureaus and departments, in order that our soldiers might reach European soil before the line of the Allies was crushed and cut to pieces, yet notwithstanding all this, in your selfish, partisan fear that in the employment of these thousands of new civilian employees a few more Democrats might receive places than Republicans, many of you insisted that these places should be filled by civil-service regulations, though you knew that the Civil Service Commission was months behind in its work and would delay these war preparations for weeks. And you should have known that the price we would have had to pay for this delay would have been paid in the blood of the young manhood of our country.

When it became necessary to not alone finance our own war expenses but those of our allies as well and the Treasury Department was working three shifts a day printing and taking care of the sale of Liberty bonds and war savings stamps, looking after the allotments of our soldiers, and busier than ever before in its entire history, working at top speed all the time, you were continually hampering the Secretary of the Treasury by offering continued resolutions of investigation and demanding itemized statements of the expenditures of the different branches of the department, delaying and hindering this important work at this critical time in the vain hope that in the immense volume of business before the Treasury Department you might find something which would reflect upon the Democratic administration and bring discredit upon the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since the days of Robert J. Walker. [Applause.]

Several times you Republicans tried to take the management and control of this war out of the hands of President Wilson and the Democratic administration and put this management in the control of a joint committee of Members of the House and Senate. Had you been successful in your efforts to do this, and had the control of this war been placed in the hands of a partisan committee, you might have succeeded in embarrassing President Wilson; you might have succeeded in embarrassing the Democratic administration; you might have succeeded in embarrassing the cause of human liberty, for little, indeed, might have been accomplished by such a committee. To-day arguments, disputes, and wrangles might still be going on in that committee and the Huns might yet be on this side of the Rhine.

What is there in the record of the Republican administrations in the conduct of a war that even in a remote degree justifies you in asking the American people to permit you to take part in the management and control of a war? They gave you a chance to show what you could do in the Spanish-American War.

According to the report of your own investigating commission, the almost criminally inefficient and incompetent manner in which that war was conducted by the Republican administration branded your party as utterly incapable and incompetent to handle such matters even on a small scale.

A Republican investigating commission, appointed by a Republican President, after being in session for 108 days, reported that during the War with Spain there was lacking in the general administration of the War Department that complete grasp of the situation which was essential to high efficiency.

Throughout all the hearing in this report we find that soldiers months after we had entered the war, and after they had been mobilized here in our own country, died by the hundreds from neglect and lack of proper medicine which should have been furnished them.

The report shows incompetency and inefficiency everywhere. It shows how guns fitted to improper carriages were sent useless into the field; it shows that small packages of medicine were shipped from one point to another in the United States by freight instead of by express and did not reach their destination for months [applause on the Democratic side]; it shows that after the war was over troops that were in the field since the beginning of the war had never been supplied with sufficient clothing or camp and garrison equipage [applause on the Democratic side]; it shows that the belts furnished the soldiers at Chickamauga were absolutely worthless on account of their flimsy character, poorness of sewing, and lack of room for the cartridges; why, months after we entered the war the only medicine on hand for weeks in base hospitals was a supply of salts, castor oil, and quinine.

Gen. Miles said that the beef furnished the soldiers would not be good in any country in the stomach of any man. The chief surgeon, at Chickamauga, testified that sick soldiers had to buy medicine at their own expense, and the testimony shows that the soldiers on transports had to trade the very shirts off their backs to the sailors for food.

When Camp Thomas, at Chickamauga, where we had 60,000 soldiers, was a veritable pest hole, according to the testimony under oath of Maj. Helborn, of Kentucky, the Quartermaster Department failed to furnish tents, and the men having fever, measles, and other diseases were exposed to the rain on rainy nights.

Gen. Brooke, in command at this camp, was clamoring for tents and supplies and medicines, which he did not receive for weeks, though at the same time there were immense stores piled up at St. Louis only a few hundred miles away. Asst. Surg. Gen. Wright was asked by the investigating commission this question:

Would it not have been just as easy for you as chief medical purveyor of the Western Department to have your office at Camp Thomas as to have had it at St. Louis?

He replied:

Hardly. * * * There was an immense stock of goods there. It would take days to move them, and it could not be done at an expense under $2,000.

The commission then asked Gen. Wright:

Would it have been possible if you had had the necessary orders to have purchased within a very short time all the cots, all the hospital supplies needed, either in the city of St. Louis or by telegraph from other cities adjacent?

Gen. Wright replied:

We could have furnished them certainly by early in June if we had directions to make provision for them.

Yet, on June 28, the chief surgeon at Camp Thomas wired Washington:

Desks, pouches, medical chests, surgical instruments urgently needed.

And later on in July he again wires that—the medical supply officer here has repeatedly been directed by me to make requisition for supplies.

And a week later he wires Washington that he did not even have enough blank forms on hand for keeping a record of the sick.

And yet Surg. Gen. Wright stated on oath that these supplies could have been secured early in June if he had had authority or orders to provide them, but that it would cost $2,000 to move them from St. Louis.

It is no wonder, Mr. Speaker, that a political descendant of an economical administration like that holds up his hands in holy horror at the bare thought of the wages of a carpenter in Cincinnati being raised by the extravagant Democratic administration. But the Democratic administration would rather pay a carpenter more money than he was worth than permit hundreds of our young American boys, dying with typhoid, dysentery, and other diseases, to lie in the rain, on the bare ground, in the cold mountain air, with no cots to lay in, no tents above their heads, and no medical supplies other than what these poor sick soldiers bought with money taken from their own pockets.

But this inefficiency was not confined to the Medical Department and the Quartermaster Department, but everywhere. In July Gen. Brooke wired The Adjutant General:

I deem it my duty to say that there has not been one single regiment fully equipped under the present system of supplying the ordnance equipment of the soldiers.

From Jacksonville the Chief of Ordnance of the Seventh Corps wires:

Not a single bayonet, scabbard, cartridge belt, canteen, haversack, blanket, bag, and no oil and cleaning material have been received by the corps at this station, notwithstanding requisitions and repeated letters and telegrams.

The commission stated that the purchase of 7,000,000 rations by the commissary general was a colossal error for which there was no parallel.

There were instances of trainloads of sick and dying soldiers being sent through the United States without a single medical man in attendance.

At Chickamauga, according to the testimony of Maj. Coggswell, the soldiers were without meat of any kind for three weeks.

At some of the camps no laundries were in operation and great quantities of soiled bedding and sheets, and so forth, were piled up and burned.

The commissary general of the Army was court-martialed. A round robin signed by men of the high character and standing of President Theodore Roosevelt, Gen. Joseph Wheeler, Gen. Leonard Wood, Gen. Henry W. Lawton, and many others complained of the lack of knowledge in Washington of conditions in Cuba, and urged the War Department to take some action before it was too late or the Army would perish from sickness and disease—a communication from the leading officers of the American Army in Cuba which, in the language of Secretary of War Alger, "afflicted the country with a plague of anguish and apprehension."

I am not criticizing the Republican administration for these unfortunate occurrences and this state of affairs, for I know that everyone connected with that administration did the best they could for our soldiers. I am only mentioning this to show that with the best intentions in the world to do right the Republican administration was incompetent and inefficient and did not know how to conduct and manage a war. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

No; I am not criticizing it; I think you did the best you could. Now, I yield to anyone over on that side to state that you did not do the best you could.

SEVERAL REPUBLICAN MEMBERS. We do not think that you are criticizing us.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I can not yield. Give me 5 or 10 minutes more and I will yield to every one of you.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will give the gentleman an hour.

Mr. COLLIER. If the House will give—ask unanimous consent for 10 minutes more time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent of the gentleman to yield.

Mr. COLLIER. I ask you to give me 10 minutes more time. Do not take up my time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I hope that this is not to be taken out of my time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I submit as a point of order that it is improper for Members to interfere with a gentleman who has the floor, and I ask for a ruling on my point of order.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Texas be called to order.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Texas has a right to make a point of order, Mr. Speaker, when Republicans are out of order.

Mr. COLLIER. I hope this does not come out of my time.

The report of the investigating commission further shows that when Gen. Shafter was sending imploring telegrams to the department here in Washington for medicine and hospital supplies these medicines and supplies were packed in the holds of transports under heavy freight and kept on these transports for months, and many of them were returned to the United States unloaded, because no one knew where they were. Why, the report shows that one 200-bed hospital outfit, beds, operating tables, surgical instruments, blankets, an entire outfit, several carloads of supplies, were shipped to one of the camps here in the United States and were lost and never found until after the war, when they were discovered in an abandoned warehouse.

And, with a record like this not much more than 20 years ago, you wanted us to take the control and management of this war out of the hands of President Wilson and the Democratic administration and turn it over in part to you.

I do not intend to go further into the report of the investigating commission other than to give you one of the conclusions of the commission, and I give you this only as justification to us in refusing to permit you to take the management of the war away from the Democratic administration. "Fortunately for the sick at various times and in many places," recited the commission, "private charity came to the rescue, and a large amount of milk and ice, of delicacies, of even lacking medicines, instruments, and articles of hospital furniture were supplied by the National Relief Commission, auxiliary Red Cross associations, State and local aid societies, and individuals. * * * It was a fact, and one to be regretted, one that should not have existed, that again and again agents of private organizations had on hand and ready for issue an abundance of necessary and needed supplies when the officers of the Government whose duty it was to furnish them did not have them and therefore could not give them out."

And yet because we raised the wages of a carpenter in Cincinnati and were doubtless extravagant in building camps on cost-plus contracts, and located a nitrate plant in the South, and had a quantity of canned goods left over after the war, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] would not only have taken away from the Democratic administration and President Wilson the management and control of the most successfully conducted war in the world's history, but at the same time in their partisanship they would blacken and soil and besmirch some of the brightest pages in the annals of our country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Speaker, I would not be fair either to this House or to myself if I did not state that the Republican investigating commission excused the greater part of the inefficiency and incompetency of the Republican administration because of the stupendous task of raising an army of nearly 250,000 men and sending nearly 20,000 of them a few hundred miles to Cuba. It was too big a job for the Republican administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

For every soldier the Republican administration sent a few hundred miles to Cuba and failed to give him needed medicine, equipment, and supplies, the Democratic administration sent over 100 men, fully equipped with all medicine, hospital, and other supplies, over 3,000 miles to Europe, and at the same time took care of over 2,000,000 soldiers here in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, if the Republican administration, though honestly and patriotically doing the very best it could, was unable to properly equip and take care of 250,000 soldiers during the progress of a war a few hundred miles from our shores, should not the American people thank God that when it came to the equipping and taking care of an Army of over 4,000,000 soldiers and safely sending 2,000,000 of them over 3,000 miles across the seas, to meet what was then supposed to be the greatest and most powerful military machine on the face of the earth, and, meeting it, break that machine to pieces as they drove the great army of Huns in confusion across the Rhine, should not the American people thank God that in the great World War there was in power an administration which knew how such a war should be properly and victoriously conducted? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The mistakes, Mr. Speaker, of the Republican administration in the War with Spain have been buried for over 20 years. They have been forgotten, and all we remember is the glory and valor of American achievement, as our brave soldiers in a tropical land willingly offered their lives that a nation might be free. Yes; the mistakes have been buried for over 20 years, and it is with reluctance that I open a grave which we all hoped had been sealed forever. My only justification in briefly resurrecting this part of the history of that conflict with Spain is to show how dangerous and how cruel it would have been to our soldiers and their loved ones here in the United States for us to have permitted the management and control of this war to have been taken out of the hands of the Democratic administration and turned over, even in part, to the political descendant of those who, however earnestly and patriotically trying to do the best they could, yet made such costly, deadly, and colossal blunders in the Spanish-American War. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When you found that President Wilson was rapidly becoming the foremost figure in all the world and that something must be done to discredit the Democratic administration so that you might be kept in power, you conceived the idea of starting out almost as a unit against the league of nations.

Why, a resolution was introduced by one of your greatest leaders to practically nullify any part we might play in the league. The papers were full of the resolution. The Republican leaders gave out their interviews favoring this resolution and the day was set when it should be adopted. But that day has long passed, and, like the bill brought in by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of this House, the resolution is lying somewhere on the Senate table in the hope that it may be forgotten. It seems that patriotic and far-seeing men like Mr. Taft and Mr. Root and Mr. Wickersham told your wonderful leaders that if they did not want to destroy the Republican Party they had better stop trying to obstruct the advance of human progress, because the American people were in favor of some kind of an agreement which would, at least for a while, put an end to these cruel and unnecessary wars.

From the moment the President landed in France you Republican leaders have done all you could to discredit him with the European powers. President Wilson as soon as war was declared called to his aid the best men he could find in this country, regardless of their political affiliations. He made a former Republican President chairman of the War Labor Board. He made his late Republican antagonist, Hughes, chairman of the aircraft investigation. Schwab, a Republican, was made chairman of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. Phillips, Assistant Secretary of State, and Woolsey, Solicitor for the State Department, both Republicans. Two Republican Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, Leffingwell and Rowe, and three Republican Assistant Secretaries of War, Crowell, Keppel, and Stettinius. Vanderlip, a Republican, chairman of the War Savings Stamp Commission, and Bielaski, a Republican, chief of the important bureau of investigation. Garfield, a Republican, Fuel Administrator, and Hoover, a Republican, Food Administrator.

In his fight against the Hun, President Wilson showed a patriotism above partisanship and party lines. Did you Republican Members of this House and elsewhere, in President Wilson's fight to preserve peace and tranquillity throughout the world, did you rise above partisanship and party lines? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When Woodrow Wilson sat at the peace table at Versailles he was not alone your spokesman, not alone our spokesman, but the spokesman of 100,000,000 American people. But every utterance of his before that great tribunal, of which he was the leading figure, was criticized by the Republican leaders, who in order to make political capital tried in every way they could to embarrass and humiliate and discredit the representative of all the American people as in their name and by their desire he tried as best he could to bring about a condition which would insure peace and happiness and tranquillity to the human race for generations to come. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to conclude his remarks.

Mr. COLLIER. Just one minute more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's continuing for one minute more?

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, which, of course, I shall not do, I would like to ask the gentleman to yield to a question.

Mr. COLLIER. If the gentleman will make it five minutes, I will yield.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COLLIER. I thank the House for this indulgence. In one moment I will yield to the gentleman.

But now, when you find that the democracy of this country, the American Federation of Labor, the women's organizations, the business men's leagues, all of the Democratic and independent press, and over 80 per cent of the Republican newspapers are behind Woodrow Wilson and England and France and Italy and Belgium and 41 other civilized nations for the peace treaty and the league of nations, and that, on the other hand, there is against this peace treaty and the league of nations Germany, who brought on the war; the unspeakable Turk, the murderer of the Christian; and a few misguided Republican leaders in this country, who know not what they do; when you Republicans find all this, I prophesy that there is going to be the greatest change of heart on the Republican side of this House ever before witnessed in the history of politics in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VAILE. The gentleman devoted the first part of his very interesting address to a criticism of the Republican side of the House for passing an appropriation of $1,500,000 for hospitals asked for by the Public Health Service. Is it possible that the gentleman, who was a Member of the Sixty-fifth Congress, has forgotten that the appropriation was passed by the Sixty-fifth Congress, and does he not know that a large part of that appropriation had been expended before this Congress convened, and does not he know that the appropriation was asked for by the Public Health Service, which now, as then, is under Democratic administration?

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman knows this, that in the closing hours of a three months' session of Congress a great deal is passed; but the gentleman knows this, too, that the Secretary of the Treasury came in and told us that this hospital item was an absolutely useless piece of extravagance, because there were hundreds of empty beds in the hospitals and more room then than the soldiers could use. The gentleman knows that his own chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], a man for whom I have the kindest personal feelings and the highest regard, came in and told this House it was an absolutely indefensible proposition; and yet, a few days afterwards, that same gentleman got up on this floor and asked the House to concur in an amendment which, according to his own statement and according to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, was a loss of $1,500,000 to the taxpayers of this country; and I can not reconcile myself to your hypocritical assertion that all the time you were for retrenchment.

Mr. VAILE. I would like to discuss further the matter of a hospital asked for by the Public Health Service, but another gentleman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], would like to ask a question.

Mr. COLLIER. I am always glad to yield to my friend from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to inquire whether it was not the Republican Party and a Republican leader of the Committee on Military Affairs on this side of the House that put through the bill for conscription of soldiers and the raising of this Army about which you are talking? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COLLIER. I say that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], for whom I have the highest respect and regard, led that part of the fight in which a great majority of the Democrats on this side assisted. I stated in my remarks that not all Republicans opposed all the administration measures. Why, bless my soul, there are 210 or 220 of you, and you can not get that many men together without getting up three or more tolerably good men. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Reserving the right to object—and I am not intending to object—I would like to have unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes at the conclusion of the gentleman's remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana couples with the request of the gentleman from Minnesota a request that he shall have 10 minutes at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that each Member of our Republican colleagues on that side shall have 10 minutes in which to answer the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER]. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the requests of the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] has paid a most eloquent tribute to Democratic efficiency. I have here a letter written by a soldier boy serving in northern Russia, which is also a testimonial to Democratic efficiency, and I will ask to have it read from the desk in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUFFERING ON RUSSIAN FRONT—BRAINERD SOLDIER WRITES A HARROWING STORY OF PRIVATION ENDURED—ARE FIGHTING TWO BATTLES—TRYING TO KEEP FROM STARVING TO DEATH AND DODGING BULLETS—MEN ON DETACHED SERVICE.

In a letter which eluded the censor, being carried across seas and then mailed in the United States, ——— ———, of the One hundred and sixty-eighth Company, Transport Corps, United States Army, stationed at Syren, North Russia, under date of May 28, describes the suffering and privation of American soldiers stationed there. He says:

"We are under the British, and they sure are trying to give us a rotten deal. Our ration is rotten—that is, English corn bull, M. & V. mixture, and their old hard-tack, which our dogs refuse to eat—but they expect us to fight and work with that kind of stuff.

"We do not get any potatoes or vegetables of any kind, nor bread, and if I have to stay here for the winter I am going to dig my own grave, providing some Bolsheviki does not bump me off, and that will save me the trouble.

"We came to this country to open up the railroads, so as to get American troops out of Archangel, but we are not doing such work.

"We are fighting for our lives, as the Russians do not want us here, and we have no business here at all. They put us on detached service, in which they split us all up in small bunches of 20 and 30. Well, we have captured several towns, and now we are on our way to Petrograd.

"When we came over to this country we had 720 men, and now we have 340 left, so you can imagine how the Bolsheviki are bumping us off. They have got us outnumbered 50 to 1, and they have good guns and plenty of ammunition. We are using Russian guns and what we captured from the Bolsheviks.

"We are trying to fight two battles at once—that is, trying to keep from starving to death and dodging bullets.

"We did pretty well a week ago, when we held up a train and got a carload of jam, cigarettes, tobacco, sugar, hard-tack, coffee, and also a carload of rum, and we sure had a good time. These rations belong to the British. They say 'the bloody Yanks steal everything and even take our bloody rum.'

"We do all the fighting and the British want all the credit. All we want is a transport to take us to the U. S. A., and then we will tell the people all about this war in Russia and also tell them about France.

"We do not have any trenches to fight in over here. It is all swamp land and rocks. We are living worse than a bunch of hogs. You should see us. We are full of cooties, dirty, ragged, no hair cut, no shave, and you should see your ragged soldier now. I sure would like to have a picture of myself just to show you what I look like.

"I have been all over the States, but that was a paradise compared with the life I am putting up with in this dump.

"This is the first chance I ever had to tell you about this war, as the censor will not get to see this letter at all. There are a few of our boys leaving for the U. S. A. in a few days, wounded and discharged, and one is taking my letter and will mail it in the States.

* * * * * * *

"When I land in the States they will have to civilize me all over again, as I am as ignorant and dumb as a mule. Show this letter to my old pal Hank. Will tell you more about this war when I get home."

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it any wonder that the boys who come back are loud in their praises of this administration? [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in the time allotted to me I wish to call attention to a resolution which I introduced on yesterday in reference to sending troops to Europe. On Tuesday morning I saw announced in the press, as perhaps all of you did, the statement that it was the intention of the War Department to send the Fifth and Fiftieth Infantry Regiments to Silesia. I waited to see whether or not this announcement would be confirmed by the evening papers. Nothing appeared in the evening papers on the subject, but on yesterday morning there was a further announcement that there was trouble in the mines in Silesia, and that in all probability foreign troops, including troops of the United States, would have to be called over there for the purpose of protecting them.

Desiring to know the facts in regard to this proposal, I went to the War Department, and there discovered that it is true that the regiments referred to have been ordered to Europe. I also discovered that the War Department was greatly chagrined at the information being published that it was their intention to send these troops over there. To use the language expressed to me in regard to this matter, they said "the cat had got out of the bag" from the other side and came through the cablegram sent to this country announcing this fact from Coblenz. When I asked what the purpose was in sending these troops over there, I was told that it was for the purpose of affording police protection in guarding the mines in Silesia. I was told that the further purpose was to afford protection to the railroads leading into the country where these mines are situated. A further excuse was given for sending these men over there to the effect that there is a plebiscite soon to be held in Silesia, and that these troops would act as policemen in enforcing order during the period of the campaign and up to the time of holding the election in the plebiscite.

Now, the reason why they sought to conceal this action from the American people is perfectly plain. The American people have been led to believe from statements emanating from the War Department that our troops are being brought back as fast as possible, and that they would all be brought back from France and from Germany not later than September. No wonder that they did not want the American people to know that in violation of this promise they are sending new troops over to Europe.

And why are they sending them there? I was further informed that through an interallied agreement made between the President of the United States and the allied countries it was arranged that if called upon we would send soldiers from this country over there to do police duty, the character of which is expressed by the War Department in this instance. The American people are unalterably opposed to sending more troops to Europe. [Applause.]

I see from the headlines of the press before me now that American soldiers are fighting in Silesia at this moment. We are fighting there an undeclared war. This country is not at war with Silesia, and we are intermeddling with affairs over there with which we have, and should have, nothing to do. It brings to my mind in most forcible fashion what we may expect, if you please, if this entangling alliance proposed in the articles of the peace convenant for a league of nations is entered upon. This is but a foretaste of what would be expected of us. All the little States created by this peace council are now at war with each other. Some of them will constantly be calling upon the United States to send troops over there to do the duty that these troops are now being sent over for.

If you please, I wish to call your attention to this further additional fact, that now, when we have trouble enough throughout this country of ours, and when, God knows, there is trouble enough across the border in Mexico, is it not time that we are attending to our own affairs, attending to the people who need our protection along our border, and if we want to furnish occupation for our troops we should use them there, instead of sending them across the ocean to Europe to meddle in the international affairs with which we have nothing to do?

There are practically, in round numbers, 3,600 men in a regiment, so that 7,200 men are included within these two regiments which are to go to Europe, costing the American people, if you please, $1,500,000 for transportation alone, and in addition to that we will have to pay a head tax to get them in there and a head tax to get them out, the same as was charged by France for getting our men into France and out. To do what? Not to discharge any service to the American people or perform any duty of ours, but in violation of the Constitution of the United States to invade neutral territory. I think that the American people should be apprised of this fact. [Applause.] I know that they will resent it. I know that the American people who have sons over there now are praying night and day for their coming back. It may be that no man on this floor has a son or a relative in either the Fifth or the Fiftieth Regiments, but there are fathers and mothers who have sons there, who have thought and have had reason to believe, by virtue of the promises made by this administration, that their sons would no longer be called upon to engage in war on the other side of the sea. We are representing them here, and it is our duty as representatives of the people to voice the protests that we know the people are uttering and to express by our voice and our action our determination to see to it that the wishes of the people and the promises of this administration are kept, or if violated that it be over our protest. I hope that this resolution will not be treated as a partisan measure, but that it will be treated with the spirit in which it has been offered, and an expression be had from every gentleman here with reference to what he thinks and what his people are thinking concerning our sending troops over there and keeping them there after the war has ceased, when we are trying to reestablish our normal conditions in this country. God knows that that task is enough without our taking upon ourselves all of the troubles that are perplexing Europe.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. KNUTSON. Has the gentleman seen statements in the papers to the effect that some prominent official has stated that in the event we enter the proposed league of nations it will be necessary to keep American troops in Europe for 15 years before peace is actually established over the world?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is admitted by the War Department, and it is further urged by the War Department that in the event of the consummation of this league of nations we will have to keep a minimum standing army of 500,000 men, so that we will be ready at all times to contribute whenever called upon for American troops who may be required to do police duty in Europe.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the distinguished gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman wants to get our boys home and keep them home, I would suggest that he get the Republican leaders at the other end of the Capitol to ratify the treaty and bring us peace, and then we will bring them home. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to say that that is a mere subterfuge, and this is a sample of it. If this administration is doing these things before it has the sanction of law by virtue of the ratification of this treaty, and if this administration is taking the power into its own hands to send our soldiers over there without authority, how much more will it do when it has the sanction of this so-called league of nations? [Applause.] There are more than 20 countries at war over there now. If we are going to guarantee peace over there to all these countries, do you think there will ever come a time when we will not be called upon to send and keep troops over there? For more than 2,000 years the States that constitute the Balkans have been in intermittent war. For 2,000 years more they will be in war, and one side or the other will be constantly and eternally calling upon the United States to come over and participate in their differences. What do you think of this prospect? To my mind it is fraught with danger, dark and sinister, threatening not only our hoped-for peace and tranquillity but also threatening the very life of our system of government.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Would not this treaty have been ratified long ago if it had not insisted upon our entering into entangling alliances with Europe and restricting American rights? [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is no question about that. And speaking about possibilities, if the President of the United States had sent some representative citizens of the United States over there when the armistice was signed to negotiate a peace treaty, and had he proclaimed to the people of the world, "We have done the work that we went over there to do and have done it well, and we will bring our troops home, and henceforth we will live as we have lived heretofore, content in attending to our own affairs, and by precept and example continuing to show the nations of the earth the possibilities of a free people under a practical democracy to govern themselves and maintain peace and prosperity," he would have proven himself an American worthy of the plaudits of all Americans. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does not the gentleman know that with the league of nations and the disarmament agreed to under section 8 every nation on earth, the United States included, will have a smaller navy and a smaller army than it would without it?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If that be true, why is it that not only the Government of the United States but all Europe, England especially, is looking to the erection of a greater navy than ever before? [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Tell him about article 10.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; why is it that the President is so insistent upon the ratification of article 10? The answer is plain; it is furnished in the action of the President in sending these new troops to Silesia—a most practical demonstration of the purpose of article 10.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana be extended two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. If the point made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is well founded, why the necessity for a separate treaty with France?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The best answer is that the French people have no faith in this league of nations, and they would ten to one rather have the independent guaranty of England and of the United States to protect them in the future than the guaranty of the league of nations which has been proposed.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not a fact that the article of the treaty which provides for handing over 36,000,000 republicans in China to the autocratic rule of Japan is doing more to delay this peace treaty than any other one agency?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; and it is doing more to dishonor the United States than anything that has ever happened before. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

BRIDGE ACROSS PERDIDO RIVER, ALA.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1362) for the construction of a bridge across the Perdido River.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. 1362) to authorize Hiram I. Sage, a citizen of Baldwin County, Ala., to construct and maintain a bridge across the Perdido River at or near Nunez Ferry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Hiram I. Sage, of Baldwin County, Ala., his heirs and assigns, be, and he is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge and approaches thereto across the Perdido River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in section 22, township 6 south, range 6 east, in Baldwin County, Ala., at or near the point known as Nunez Ferry, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DENT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GENERAL OF THE ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas presents a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 265.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 7594, being a bill relating to the creation of the office of General in the Armies of the United States. That there shall be 30 minutes of general debate; one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from California, Mr. KAHN; one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. DENT. At the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read for amendments, whereupon the bill with the amendments, if any, shall be reported to the House. That the previous questions shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments to final passage, without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, since agreeing with the resolution which provides for 30 minutes' debate on the bill which it makes in order, gentlemen have asked for more time for the consideration of the general subject than is permitted under the rule. I shall therefore take the hour entitled under the rule and divide it with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a question.

Mr. BEE. This is a bill to confer the grade of general upon Gen. Pershing?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It makes in order a bill authorizing the President to appoint a general of the Army——

Mr. BEE. Will Members be indulged in political discussion, or is it contemplated that the discussion will be confined to the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I assume that gentlemen will confine themselves to the subject matter under consideration. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], and ask him to use some of his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. POU. I will say that this resolution makes in order a bill which will authorize the President to confer the highest Army rank and title on Gen. Pershing. I think I voice the sentiment of every man on this side of the Chamber by saying that it has our unanimous support; that the man who was designated by the President as the head of our military forces in Europe has made such a record that he is entitled to this high rank and honor.

I could speak more in detail about the great work of Gen. Pershing, and the splendid Army under him, but I believe that it is not necessary. I believe there is a feeling throughout the United States on the part of the man on the street, the business man, the professional man, and everybody who has followed the course of events in Europe, that Gen. Pershing is entitled to the highest military honor that can be conferred by this Government. [Applause.]

Let us hope he is at least one man who will not be charged with inefficiency; I hope so. I will say for myself that under his administration the war was brought to an end very much sooner than I for one dreamed that it could be finished. Just where he could have been more efficient, as a layman I do not know. We do know that he was sent over there to do the job, and he did it in much quicker time than anybody dreamed he could do it. [Applause.] The loss among the American troops was very much less than the average man feared it would be. So I say that I believe this is a resolution which this House will take pleasure in passing, in recognizing the splendid achievements of this general who was the head of our military forces in Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman tell us what became of the recommendation that Gen. March was to be included in the bill?

Mr. POU. I can not answer that question. I can only state what I have heard, but I think the inquiry of my friend had best be addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DYER. It was not before the Committee on Rules?

Mr. POU. No.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. This resolution does not authorize the conferring of the grade of general on Gen. March?

Mr. POU. The resolution only confers authority on the President to appoint Gen. Pershing.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is correct.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. And it could not authorize the conferring of the grade upon Gen. March?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not this resolution.

Mr. POU. There is only one appointment that could be made under the wording of the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I think there is no doubt as to what the President would do as between Gen. Pershing and Gen. March.

Mr. POU. We understand that the purpose of the bill is to give the President of the United States the authority to confer this title upon Gen. Pershing.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the gentleman will permit me, the bill provides that—the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint to said office a general officer of the Army who, on foreign soil and during the recent war, has been especially distinguished in the higher command of military forces of the United States.

Mr. POU. The provisions of the bill are such that there could not be any uncertainty.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] has well said that practically every individual in this country will favor this legislation. I think, however, that it is proper to put into the RECORD at this time some of the wonderful achievements of the commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces, Gen. John J. Pershing.
